[1] We are of the opinion that the trial court was in error in its conclusion of law based upon the foregoing findings of fact that the defendant Jones was not personally liable to the plaintiff for the amount of the obligation of Huff which he assumed and agreed to pay at the time of the transfer to him by said Huff of the latter's interest in the copartnership and in the property which secured said obligation; and was also in error in its judgment predicated upon such conclusion of law.

In so far as the defendant Huff was concerned, the averment of the respondent Jones to the effect that in assuming the obligation of Huff to the plaintiff herein he was acting as the agent of an undisclosed principal would admittedly have constituted no defense in an action brought by Huff to enforce said obligation. Nor do we think it would be sufficient to constitute a defense to the action brought by this plaintiff to enforce the obligation against Jones, which, in the capacity of a principal on the face thereof, he entered into as between himself and Huff, but which inured to the benefit of the plaintiff by virtue of the fact that he was the creditor of Huff at the time. In the case of Williams v. Naftzger, 103 Cal. 439, 37 P. 411, it was held by this court that an agreement on the part of a grantee to pay and discharge a mortgage debt upon the granted premises for which his grantor is liable, renders the grantee liable therefor to the mortgagee, and in an action for the foreclosure of the mortgage, if the mortgaged premises are insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt, judgment may be entered against the said grantee as well as against the mortgagor for the amount of such deficiency. "This liability" says the court "results from the familiar doctrine in equity that a creditor is entitled to the benefit of all securities or collateral obligations that his principal debtor may have given to the surety for the payment of the debt. By the conveyance of the mortgaged premises and the assumption of the mortgage debt by the grantee, the latter, as between himself and the grantor, becomes primarily liable to the mortgagee and his vendor becomes his surety." This conclusion is predicated upon section 2854 of the Civil Code, wherein the like language is found.

The decision of this court in the above-cited case was approved by this court in the case of Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133,[1] and has not since in anywise been departed from or modified. We are cited by the respondent to no case which supports the doctrine that the said defense herein, which he could not have availed himself of in an action brought against him by Huff, can be made available to him in an action brought by the creditor of Huff to enforce the latter's direct obligation which the respondent, in the capacity of a principal, and for a full and valuable consideration, has assumed and agreed to pay. The argument, which the respondent puts forth as the basis for such doctrine, is that the liability which he assumes with respect to Huff in the capacity of a principal, but in the actual though undisclosed relation of an agent for a concealed principal, arises through the application of the doctrine of estoppel which would forbid him to plead his agency as against Huff.

[2] We are of the opinion, however, that the liability of Jones to Huff upon such a transaction, whether or not it may be based in part upon estoppel, rests upon the fact that he has contracted as a principal and thus made the contract his own, and that his immediate creditor is entitled to hold him to that relation, or, if he would be advantaged thereby, to treat him not as a principal but as the agent of his undisclosed principal, and to hold the latter liable as such. 1 Cal. Juris, 819–822, 860. If such be the basis of the obligation of Jones to Huff, it is equally the basis of the obligation which, under the authorities above cited, Jones has assumed with relation to and for the benefit of the creditor of Huff, and which the plaintiff in this action seeks as such creditor to enforce as a contract made for the latter's benefit. It follows that the trial court was in error in finding in its conclusion of law that the defendant Jones was not personally liable to the plaintiff in this action, and was also in error in its judgment based thereon, wherein it failed to provide for a deficiency judgment against Jones for the enforcement of such personal liability.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to so modify its conclusions of law and its judgment based thereon as to declare and decree the personal liability of the respondent Jones to the plaintiff upon his assumed obligation, and to provide for a deficiency judgment against said respondent in the event that the mortgaged property shall upon sale thereof be found insufficient to satisfy said obligation.

SCOTT et al. v. HENRY. (Sac. 3493.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟹158½(2) — Deeds misdescribing land admissible in aid of oral proof of parol grant of easement.

Deeds improperly describing lands of servient tenement were properly admitted for limited purpose of showing mutual mistake of parties in description and in aid of plaintiffs' offered proof of executed parol grant of easement to maintain irrigation ditch, which had become effectual by exercise while grantor was still owner of land.

2. Waters and water courses ⟹158½(2) — Deeds admissible, although recordation imparted no notice to defendant.

Deeds improperly describing land of servient estate, admitted solely to show mistake in description and in aid of plaintiffs' offered proof of executed parol grant of easement to maintain irrigation ditch, held properly admitted, though recordation thereof imparted no notice to defendant of plaintiffs' alleged right to easement so as to aid latters' claim by prescription, where plaintiffs' claim did not depend for inception on deeds or notice imparted by making or recordation thereof.

3. Waters and water courses ⊂158½(2)—Evidence held to show oral grant of easement.

In suit to enjoin defendant from interfering with plaintiffs' alleged right to maintain and use ditch on or across defendant's land, evidence held to show oral grant of easement before defendant purchased land.

4. Frauds, statute of ⊂60(2)—Easement may be acquired by parol.

An equitable title to an easement to maintain and use a water ditch on and across land of another may be acquired by parol.

5. Waters and water courses ⊂152(8)—Evidence held to establish continuance of use of ditch.

Evidence held sufficient to show plaintiffs' open, notorious, continuous, peaceable, and uninterrupted use of ditch to convey water for irrigation whenever and as often as irrigation was necessary, notwithstanding occasional interruptions.

6. Waters and water courses ⊂151—Obstructions if ditch held not to manifest purpose of defendant to interrupt plaintiffs' use.

Interruptions by defendant with integrity of ditch, easement of which was possessed by plaintiffs to convey water for irrigation, and obstructions placed therein by persons unknown to plaintiffs, held not such as to frequency or persistence as to manifest purpose by defendant to so interrupt plaintiffs' otherwise open, peaceable, and continuous use of ditch as to prevent running of prescriptive period.

7. Waters and water courses ⊂158½(2)—Use of ditch held sufficient to put purchaser of land on inquiry.

In view of Civ. Code, § 19, evidence held to show that at date of defendant's acquisition of title to land and for several months prior thereto ditch claimed by plaintiffs was plainly visible and in use on and across land, and sufficient to put purchaser on such inquiry as to possible adverse user as would lead him to actual knowledge of rights of those apparently exercising easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by Effa May Scott, executrix of the last will of C. L. Scott, deceased, substituted as plaintiff instead of deceased, and another against John Henry. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, for appellant.

John G. Covert, of Hanford, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to enjoin the defendant from interfering with the plaintiffs' alleged right to maintain and use a water ditch upon and across the defendant's land. The plaintiffs, in their second amended complaint, based their claim of right to maintain and use said ditch in common with each other and with the defendant upon their ownership of an easement alleged to have been acquired by plaintiffs from the predecessor of the defendant in the ownership of the servient tenement, and also by prescription. The defendant in his answer denied each of these sources of title in the plaintiffs, and upon the issues thus joined the cause went to trial. The trial court made its findings of fact in plaintiffs' favor, wherein it found that the plaintiffs had acquired their ownership in said easement before the defendant became the owner of the land, and also found that the plaintiffs had acquired a prescriptive right to said easement by open, peaceable, continuous, uninterrupted, and adverse maintenance and use of said ditch for a period of more than five years prior to a date antedating the commencement of the action. From the judgment based upon these findings the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the deeds by which the plaintiffs purported to have acquired their rights to construct, maintain, and use said ditch from one Papalian, the grantor of the servient tenement to the defendant, were nullities, for the reason that in neither of said deeds were the lands subsequently conveyed by Papalian to the defendant correctly or at all described. The error in description in one of these deeds consisted in describing the lands of the servient tenement as situated in the northeast instead of the northwest quarter of the government section in which the lands of the defendant are in fact located, and in the other deed consisted in locating said lands in the wrong township altogether and in a section six miles east of the defendant's said location. When the plaintiffs offered these deeds in evidence respectively the defendant objected to their introduction as muniments of title to the easement in question, whereupon the plaintiffs conceded, and the court ruled, that as such they were not admissible. They were then offered by the plaintiffs in connection with the testimony of Papalian, the grantor therein, to the effect that he intended by these conveyances to give to the plaintiffs the right to said easement upon and over the particular land in question which he then did own, and not upon and over other and distant lands which he did not own, and that the erroneous descriptions in said deeds were due to the mutual mistake of the parties. These deeds were admitted solely for that limited purpose and in aid of the plaintiffs' offered proof of an executed parol grant of said easement which had become effectual by its exercise while Papalian was still the owner of the land. The appellant has produced no authority to the effect that the admission of said conveyances for such limited purpose was error, nor do we think it was so.

[2, 3] The main contention of the appellant with regard to the admission of these conveyances is that, since they embraced descriptions of other land than that of which he subsequently became the owner by purchase from Papalian, their recordation imparted no notice to him of the plaintiffs' alleged right to this easement so as to aid the latters' claim of title by prescription. As to that contention the defendant is doubtless correct. That he is so is, however, of little aid to him upon this appeal since the plaintiffs' claim of title by prescription does not depend for its inception upon these deeds nor upon notice imparted by the making or recordation thereof, but, as we shall presently see, upon evidence of actual and visible occupation and use of the water ditch upon and over the land at the time of the defendant's purchase thereof and thereafter for the time required to perfect such prescriptive right. Before dealing with this phase of the appeal, however, we should consider the asserted right of the plaintiffs to this easement based upon an executed oral grant from the then owner of the land, Papalian. As to the facts attending this oral grant the evidence in the case is uncontradicted, and is all one way. The plaintiffs, Papalian, and other witnesses concur in testifying that in the early part of the year 1913 Papalian, the then owner of the servient tenement, not only made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiffs the deeds respectively by which he intended to invest them, and each of them, with the title to this easement, but also went with them upon the land, and there undertook to orally invest them with the right of said ditch, and that pursuant thereto the plaintiffs did each immediately enter into the use and enjoyment of said easement by turning the waters to which they were entitled from other sources into the same, and by extending the actual ditch then in being over a portion of its route up to and over their own lands. It was upon this uncontradicted evidence that the trial court based its findings that the plaintiffs had become the owners of such easement prior to the date of the defendant's purchase of said land.

[4-6] That the equitable title to such an easement may be thus acquired by parol, see Rubio Cañon, etc., v. Everett, 154 Cal. 29, 96 P. 811. The only form of attack which the defendant makes upon this finding lies in his contention that, standing alone, it would be insufficiently supported to sustain the judgment, and hence would not suffice to do so except upon a sufficient showing of facts proving a prescriptive right, predicated upon such original investiture, and that as to such prescriptive right the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the plaintiffs' claim of title gained thereby. Upon this phase of the case it must be said, however, that the evidence is sharply conflicting. The testimony of the plaintiffs and their witnesses was, if believed, sufficient to show that they, and each of them began the use and extension of said ditch immediately after the making and delivery of the Papalian deeds to them embracing the erroneous descriptions and the oral investiture by the grantor in said deeds of the right to the use, extension, and enjoyment thereafter of said easement, and that such use and enjoyment thereof had been from that time forth for more than five years open, notorious, continuous, peaceable, and uninterrupted under a claim of right up to the date in the year 1918, when, for the first time, the defendant manifested an unmistakable intention to interfere with and prevent such use. It is true that this evidence shows that the actual use of said ditch for the purpose of conveying the plaintiffs' water to their lands was not continuous in the sense that it was constant; the evidence being that the plaintiffs ran water in said ditch for irrigation purposes whenever and as often as irrigation was necessary during the period from February, 1913, until April, 1918, and that they ran such water through said ditch at will and without interruption during said period. This would be sufficient to establish continuance of use. Hesperia Land Co. v. Rogers, 83 Cal. 10, 23 P. 196, 17 Am. St. Rep. 209; Strong v. Baldwin, 154 Cal. 150, 97 P. 178, 129 Am. St. Rep. 149; Pollard v. Rebman, 162 Cal. 633, 124 P. 235; Humphreys v. Blasingame, 104 Cal. 40, 37 P. 804; Silva v. Hawn, 10 Cal. App. 545, 102 P. 952. It is true, also, that there were occasional interruptions on the part of the defendant with the integrity of said ditch, such as at times plowing across portions of it, but as to these the testimony of the plaintiffs was to the effect that this was done with their concurrence, and for the purpose of clearing the lands along the line of the ditch from weeds, and that the defendant in each instance, except the final one, restored the lines and bank of the ditch. It is also true that there were occasions at irregular intervals, and mainly in the nighttime, when persons unknown to the plaintiffs had placed obstructions in the ditch, causing a diversion of the water, and these were removed by their employees. These obstructions were not such as to frequency or persistence as to manifest a definite purpose on the part of the defendant to so interrupt the plaintiffs' otherwise open, peaceable, and continuous use of said ditch as to prevent the running of the prescriptive period. With respect to these episodes the evidence is in sharp conflict, and the finding of the trial court thereon was in the plaintiffs' favor. Such findings will not be disturbed upon appeal.

[7] The final contention of the appellant is that the plaintiffs' use and occupation of said ditch was not such, nor under such claim of right, as to put him upon notice of its adverse character at the time he purchased said land from Papalian; and hence that he then, and within the five-year period of prescription, became a purchaser in good faith and for value without notice, and that the plaintiffs' occupancy and use of said ditch was not sufficient in point of time thereafter as to perfect their prescriptive right to the easement claimed by them. As to this phase of the case the evidence, however, shows that at the date of the defendant's acquisition of the title to the said land from Papalian and for several months prior thereto the ditch was plainly visible and in use by the plaintiffs upon and across said land. This fact would suffice to put the purchaser of the lands in question upon such an inquiry as to a possible adverse user as would lead him to an actual knowledge of the rights of those apparently exercising an easement over his land. Civ. Code, § 19; Dreyfus v. Hirt, 82 Cal. 621, 23 P. 193; Pollard v. Rebman, supra; Rubio Cañon, etc., v. Everett, supra; Myers v. Kenyon, 7 Cal. App. 112, 93 P. 888.

We find no merit, therefore, in the appellant's final contention.

AMOS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR SAN DIEGO COUNTY, et al. (L. A. 8636.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1925.)

1. Jury ⟹25(2), 28(3)—May be waived in civil action; jury waived by failure to demand.

Parties to a civil action may always waive a jury, and are deemed to have done so if they fail to demand it and pay the jury fee at the proper time, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 631, 883.

2. Jury ⟹31(1)—Not essential to jurisdiction of subject-matter in civil action.

The presence of a lawful jury is not essential to the jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a civil action at law, even though the parties may have a constitutional right to a trial thereof by jury.

3. Courts ⟹23, 37(1)—Cannot confer jurisdiction of subject-matter by waiver or consent.

Jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred by waiver or consent.

4. Courts ⟹30—That clerk failed to note order of court for special venire on minutes did not deprive court of jurisdiction of subject-matter.

In action for injuries in a street car accident, where the clerk neglected to make a note on the minutes of the court's order calling a special venire, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 226, held that the irregularity in the drawing of the jurors did not deprive the court of jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action.

5. Prohibition ⟹3(2)—Writ not a writ of error.

Writ of prohibition is not a writ of error, and is not available as an original writ in matters properly taken by writ of error or appeal.

6. Jury ⟹70(1)—Special venire drawn only on good reason therefor.

Provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 226, for the drawing of special venire, are intended to provide for an emergency situation, and not to be resorted to as a matter of course and without good reason therefor.

Application by Mintie Amos and another for writ of prohibition, to be directed to the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Diego, and the Honorable S. M. Marsh and others, Judges thereof, and the San Diego Electric Railway Company. Peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for petitioners.

Read G. Dilworth, of Coronado, and V. F. Bennett, of San Diego, for respondents.

MYERS, C. J. This is an application for a peremptory writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court and the judges thereof from proceeding with the trial of an action pending in said court, before a jury to be selected from a special venire, which was drawn for the purpose of the trial of that action. The pending action is one to recover damages for personal injuries growing out of a street car accident. The case having been regularly set down for trial before a jury, the presiding judge made an order directing the clerk of the court to issue and deliver to the sheriff a writ for a jury venire from which jurors were to be impaneled to try the case. This was evidently intended to be in compliance with section 226, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides:

"Whenever jurors are not drawn or summoned to attend any court of record or session thereof, or a sufficient number of jurors fail to appear, such court may order a sufficient number to be forthwith drawn and summoned to attend the court, or it may, by an order entered in its minutes, direct the sheriff, or an elisor chosen by the court forthwith to summon so many good and lawful persons of the county, or city and county, to serve as jurors, as may be required, and in either case such jurors must be summoned in the manner provided in the preceding section." (Italics added.)

The italicized words in the foregoing quotation are the ones upon which petitioners rest their contention that the respondent

court is without jurisdiction to proceed. The clerk, through inadvertence and oversight, failed to make entry of the order in the minutes. However, he did issue the writ and delivered the same to the sheriff as the order contemplated. The sheriff served the same, and on the day the case was called for trial the jurors were in attendance. The names of 12 prospective jurors were drawn, who took their places in the box and were sworn to answer questions as to their qualifications. Counsel for plaintiffs (petitioners herein) then examined the prospective jurors in the box as to their general qualifications, and, after such examination, passed them as to general qualifications, after which counsel for defendant examined and passed them as to general qualifications. Then counsel for plaintiffs examined them individually and at length respecting possible grounds for individual challenge, challenged one of them for cause, the challenge was allowed, and that juror was excused and another one drawn in his place. After concluding the examination of the individual jurors for cause, counsel for plaintiffs then interposed a challenge to the entire panel upon the ground that they were not selected or summoned in the manner required by law, because of the circumstance that the order for the drawing of the special venire had not been entered in the minutes, and because of the further circumstance that the venire as drawn and summoned consisted of but 20 jurors, only 15 of whom were present in court at the commencement of the trial. The trial court denied said challenge and objection, whereupon the plaintiffs in said action filed the present petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent court and the judges thereof from proceeding with the trial of petitioners' said action before such purported jury.

Respondents point out that in civil actions there is no such thing as a challenge to the entire jury panel, and the right to interpose such a challenge exists only in criminal cases. Estate of Wall, 187 Cal. 50, 55, 200 P. 929. Petitioners answer this by saying that the objection goes deeper than a mere challenge to the panel—that it is in effect a challenge to the very jurisdiction of the respondent court to try the cause; and they assert that, by reason of the irregularity in the impanelment of the jury, the respondent court is wholly without jurisdiction to try this cause before a jury drawn from that panel; and they contend further that the irregularity cannot be corrected by a nunc pro tunc entry of the order in the minutes of the court, even though the court actually rendered the order in due form and at a proper time, and its omission from the minutes was due solely to the inadvertence of the clerk. These contentions are not sound. They are predicated chiefly upon the decision of this court in Bruner v. Superior Court, 92 Cal. 239, 28 P. 341. In that case the defendant procured a writ of prohibition from this court to restrain the superior court from trying him upon an indictment returned by a grand jury which had not been impaneled in accordance with law. The grand jurors who returned the indictment had been summoned by an elisor appointed by the court in a case wherein the sheriff admittedly was not disqualified. The law did not authorize the appointment of an elisor or the summoning of grand jurors by an elisor in cases where the sheriff was not disqualified. This court held, therefore, that the so-called grand jury was not a lawful or constitutional grand jury, and that the purported indictment returned by it was void, and concluding that the trial court was without jurisdiction to proceed with the trial of the defendant upon a void indictment, issued a peremptory writ of prohibition. The soundness of that decision may be conceded for the purposes hereof, but it is not controlling of the present proceeding.

[1-3] Petitioners have lost sight of the distinction between criminal actions and civil actions with relation to questions of trial by jury. In criminal actions of a felony grade the trial jury is an essential constituent element of the court to try the defendant, the presence of which cannot be waived by the defendant even though he be willing to do so. It may also be said that, in the absence of an indictment found and returned by a lawfully constituted grand jury, or of an information duly signed and filed by a district attorney following the issuance of a complaint and a preliminary hearing thereon, the court is without jurisdiction to hold for trial a defendant charged with a felony. But in a civil action it cannot be said in any case that the court is without jurisdiction to try the case because of the absence of a jury. In a civil action at law wherein a jury is demandable as of right, and is duly demanded, it doubtless would be reversible error to deny such demand. Farrel v. City of Ontario, 39 Cal. App. 351, 178 P. 740; Estate of Baird, 173 Cal. 617, 160 P. 1078. But the parties to a civil action may always waive a jury, and, indeed, are deemed to have done so if they fail to demand it and pay the jury fees at the time prescribed by law therefor. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 631, 883. It follows that the presence of a lawful jury is not essential to jurisdiction of the subject-matter of a civil action at law, even though the parties thereto may have a constitutional right to a trial thereof before a jury. If it were, it could not be waived. It is fundamental that jurisdiction of the subject-matter cannot be conferred by waiver or consent (7 Cal. Juris. pp. 597, 598), or by estoppel. Lindsay-Strathmore Irr. Dist. v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 315, 331, 334, 187 P. 1056.

[4, 5] The parties to this action might have stipulated, if they had been willing to do so, that the action should be tried before a jury to consist of 12 persons, who had neither been drawn nor summoned as jurors, and who were not even citizens of the state. If this had been done, and if the trial were otherwise regular, the verdict of such a jury would be binding upon both parties. This being true, the irregularity in the drawing of the jurors herein could not have operated to deprive the court of jurisdiction to proceed with the trial. The cases of People v. Compton, 132 Cal. 484, 64 P. 849, and People v. Wong Bin, 139 Cal. 60, 72 P. 505, are inapplicable to the present situation for the reasons above indicated. It may be that, if the respondent court compels the plaintiffs to proceed to trial before such jury, it will constitute reversible error. Upon this question we express no opinion. The writ of prohibition is not a writ of error and we are not disposed to use it as such. The respondent court, having jurisdiction of both the parties and the subject-matter, may commit error in the exercise of such jurisdiction, and the appropriate remedy for the correction thereof is an appeal. This court is not disposed to encourage the practice of resorting to appellate courts for original writs for the purpose of procuring what amounts to a pro tanto review upon appeal before the cause has proceeded to final judgment in the trial court. Assuming, without deciding, that it may be reversible error for the trial court to deny plaintiffs' challenge and overrule their objections, nevertheless it may happen that the verdict and judgment when rendered will be entirely satisfactory to petitioners, in which event there will be no occasion to review this ruling.

[6] It is alleged in the petition, and not denied herein, "that there is a trial jury box in the county of San Diego containing the names of approximately 400 qualified jurors that have not been drawn or summoned to attend as trial jurors in said county, and that, when the said action of petitioners was called for trial, jurors had not been drawn from said trial jury box or summoned to attend said court at all." In this connection the statement is made in the briefs of counsel that it has been the practice of the superior court of San Diego county to favor the drawing of special venires for the trial of civil actions because of the great expense occasioned the county by using drawn juries, in that jurors are usually located at different distant points in the county, and because such jurors, if drawn and summoned, would be inconvenienced by being compelled to leave their farms. It is plainly the legislative intent that, in the ordinary course of judicial procedure, jury lists are to be made up and jurors drawn therefrom by lot in the manner prescribed in sections 204 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure. The provisions of section 226, Code of Civil Procedure, for the drawing of a special venire, wherein the jurors to be summoned are selected by the sheriff or elisor who executes the writ, are obviously intended to provide for an emergency situation and not to be resorted to regularly as a matter of course, or without good reason. This court has repeatedly pointed out the dangers inherent in the practice of resorting to special venires, and has repeatedly indicated that the better practice is to use jurors whose names are drawn from the term trial jury box. Bruner v. Superior Court, supra; Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 P. 272; People v. Yeaton, 75 Cal. 415, 17 P. 544; People v. Suesser, 142 Cal. 354, 360, 75 P. 1093; Estate of Wall, 187 Cal. 50, 200 P. 929. The record in this case, however, does not indicate that any such practice has been followed by the respondent judges or by any of them. Neither does it establish the fact that there may not have existed some sufficient reason for resort in the present instance to the procedure prescribed in Code of Civil Procedure, § 226. In any event, the action of the trial court in resorting to a special venire, even though no good reason therefor existed, would be no more than error in the exercise of jurisdiction.

The application for a peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ discharged.

SAN FRANCISCO CREDIT CLEARING HOUSE v. WELLS. (S. F. 11437.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1925.)

1. Adverse possession ⟸114(1) — Evidence held not to establish elements of adverse possession.

In an action of replevin to recover a piano which had been sold by purchaser in violation of her conditional sales contract and purchased by defendant at auction, evidence held not to show elements necessary for adverse possession by defendant or predecessors for statutory period, so as to give defendant title.

2. Adverse possession ⟸112—Burden of proving elements of adverse possession or prescriptive title on party relying on same.

The burden of proving elements of adverse possession or prescriptive title is upon the party relying upon it.

3. Action ⟸63—At law, statute of limitations, not doctrine of laches, furnishes rule of decision.

In an action at law, the statute of limitations, rather than doctrine of laches, furnishes rule of decision.

4. Limitation of actions ⊂⊃45—Action against purchaser of converted property may be commenced within three years after he receives property, under Code.

An action of replevin, commenced within three years after defendant purchased converted property, is not barred by Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, requiring such actions to be brought within three years, though combined possession, which was not adverse, of defendant and others was over three years; for as against a wrongdoer statute begins to run from date he receives property, and is not modified by Civ. Code, § 1007, conferring title on occupants for period limiting bringing of actions.

5. Adverse possession ⊂⊃43(1) — Wrongdoer cannot add possession of other wrongdoers to his own so as to come within bar of statute of limitations; "taking and detaining."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 3, requiring actions for taking and detaining of property to be commenced within three years, a wrongdoer not possessing property for statutory period cannot avail himself of bar of statute by adding possession of other wrongdoers in privity to his own, since words "taking," etc., relate to person who wrongfully received property when action was brought.

Replevin by the San Francisco Credit Clearing House against C. B. Wells. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

SEAWELL, J. The facts of this case, the questions of law involved, and the proceedings had in the lower court are stated generally in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and we adopt the same, supplemented by such additional facts as may seem to us to give some additional basic support for the conclusion reached. The statement of the case by the District Court of Appeal follows:

"Action in replevin to recover a certain piano and bench.

"There is no dispute as to the facts. It appears therefrom that on the 2d day of August, 1911, the Aeolian Company of New York, a corporation engaged in the manufacture and sale of musical instruments, entered into a conditional contract of sale with one Sarah S. Rodgers for a Weber pianola and bench. The terms of this sales agreement provided for payments in installments, with the usual provision that title should not pass until completion of payments, and in case of default in any of the installments, the company could take possession of the property without demand. The price agreed to be paid for the piano and bench was the sum of $1,800, $100 of which was to be paid on the 2d day of August, 1911, $100 on the 15th day of October following, and $100 on the 15th of each and every third month thereafter, beginning with the 15th day of January, 1912, until the entire sum with interest was paid. Pursuant to this contract delivery of the piano was had, and thereafter and from time to time payments were made on account. The last payment occurred on January 3, 1913, and apart from the sum of $600, which was credited as an allowance for a piano turned in by the purchaser, only the sum of $551 was paid on her account. At this time the purchaser, the piano, and the bench disappeared, and after a lapse of some five years, and shortly before the 12th day of June, 1918, the property was discovered in the possession of the respondent, Wells, the defendant in this action. It appears that Mr. Wells bought the piano and bench, on the 29th day of November, 1915, for the sum of $925 from one E. Curtis, an auctioneer in San Francisco. The property had been sold by Curtis at the instance of and as the property of one Mrs. S. J. Moran. The Aeolian Company, upon the discovery of the piano, made an assignment of all its rights in the instrument to the plaintiff in this action. Formal demand was thereupon made upon Wells for its possession, and, this demand being refused, the present action in replevin was instituted.

"Additional facts show that shortly after the service of the demand by the plaintiff, the defendant, Wells, commenced an action against Mrs. Moran, in which he sought to recover the sum of $925, which sum he had paid Curtis for the piano and bench. This action was premised upon her fraudulent representations as to ownership. Wells recovered a judgment for the full amount prayed for and costs. It appears from the return of the sheriff that he executed upon this judgment and collected the sum of $203.95, $201.92 of which was turned over to Wells and receipted for in part satisfaction of the judgment.

"At the conclusion of the trial in the instant case the court found that on the 2d day of August, 1911, the Aeolian Company was the owner of the piano and bench, and that it entered into the agreement above referred to with Sarah Rodgers, and that on the 29th day of May, 1918, it had assigned and transferred its rights therein to plaintiff, who had made written demand upon defendant for the possession of the piano and bench. It further found, however, that plaintiff's action was barred by section 338, subd. 3, section 337, subds. 1 and 2, and section 339, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the action was also barred by laches, and that plaintiff did not acquire any interest in the property by virtue of the assignment, but, on the contrary, the defendant, Wells, was the owner thereof and entitled to the possession of the same. * * *"

The conditional sale contract provided that said personal property was to be delivered to Mrs. Sarah S. Rodgers, whose address for delivery was given as East Fifty-Eighth street, New York City. There being no other evidence as to the place of delivery, it must be inferred that said personal property was delivered to her at the place named in the contract. As to what period of time the property remained in New York City after the execution of the contract, or when, or under what circumstances it was brought into this state, the record is silent. From the day on which the last installment was paid to the Aeolian Company under said contract, to wit, January 3, 1913, to the day that said property was delivered by one Mrs. S. J. Moran to the auctioneer for sale and was purchased at auction sale by Mr. Wells, to wit, November 29, 1915, it was clandestinely possessed. As a matter of fact, said company had no knowledge of the sale of said personal property or by whom the actual possession was held, or where it had been detained, after the day of said last payment, until it was discovered in the possession of Mr. Wells in May, 1918, a period of approximately five years and four months. No charge of intentional wrong is imputable to Mr. Wells. No privity is shown to have existed between him and Mrs. Moran or between him and Mrs. Rodgers.

[1, 2] The question which seems to us to be decisive of the case is whether plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 3, Code of Civil Procedure, as found by the trial court. The second question, as to whether the possession of defendant, or any one of the parties under whom he claims title, or the possession of all of them considered together, none of whom was in possession for a period of three years after a cause of action for its detention had accrued in favor of plaintiff's assignor, was legally sufficient to support respondent's claim of title by adverse possession, is discussed by respondent, but we think the latter question is rendered unimportant by the fact that the possession of the defendant, or by any or all of the persons under whom he claims, is wholly lacking in those essentials which are necessary to the creation of a title by adverse possession. Said property was not held by the defendant or by those under whom he claims openly or notoriously, continuously and uninterruptedly, for the statutory period, exclusively and under a claim of right, nor were the taxes shown to have been paid by the adverse claimants. Neither the defendant nor his predecessors possessed said property continuously for the full statutory period. Its possession was not open and notorious, but clandestine, and the owner was without the means of knowing in whose possession it actually was or that the possessor asserted an adverse claim to it. In fact, the place of its location was concealed from the owner. The burden of proving all the essential elements of an adverse possession or prescriptive title is upon the party relying upon it. 1 Cal. Jur. 636; Allen v. Allen, 159 Cal. 197, 113 P. 160. There is no evidence of any kind to be found in the record which tends to support a claim of title by adverse possession.

[3] The trial court specifically found, in addition to the bar of the statute, that plaintiff and its assignor were also guilty of laches. This being an action at law, the statute of limitations, rather than the doctrine of laches, furnishes the rule of decision. Brownrigg v. de Frees et al. (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 714; Anzar v. Miller, 90 Cal. 342, 27 P. 299; 10 Cal. Jur. 522.

[4] Section 338, subd. 3, prescribes that "an action for taking, detaining, or injuring any goods, or chattels, including actions for the specific recovery of personal property," must be commenced within three years. Mrs. Rodgers, upon disposing of the personalty to which she had no title, thereby became a converter of the same. The title remained in the seller by the terms of said contract. The last installment was paid by her on January 3, 1913. She then defaulted in all subsequent payments. Within a period of three years thereafter, to wit, November 29, 1915, the defendant became the purchaser at an auction sale. Within three years after this purchase, plaintiff, after demand, brought this action to recover the possession of said property. We think the rule of law declared in Harpending v. Meyer, 55 Cal. 555, is determinative of the rights of the parties to this action. In that case Baux, a bailee, wrongfully pledged the plaintiff's jewelry to the defendant Meyer, a pawnbroker. Plaintiff subsequently commenced an action in conversion against the pledgee. The defense was made there, as here, that the action was barred by subdivision 3, § 338, Code of Civil Procedure. The court, in discussing the question as to when the right of action accrues in this class of cases, in part said:

"In Wells v. Ragland, 1 Swan (Tenn.) 501, it is distinctly held that where the possession of property is obtained from one who had no right to transfer it, a right of action by the owner against the transferee accrues as soon as the latter acquires possession of it; that the bare taking of possession under such circumstances constitutes a new conversion on the part of the person taking it, and that from the time of the commission of that act, the statute will commence running. * * *

"We are unable to perceive, however, that a person can ever be considered a bona fide purchaser of goods from one who has no right to sell, in a case where the rule of caveat emptor applies. The law imputes notice to him. Under that rule he is not only put upon inquiry, but he is conclusively presumed to have ascertained the true ownership of the property before purchasing it. If he has notice in fact, no demand upon him for the property is necessary before commencing the action to recover it. * * *

"We shall hold, in accordance with the rule adopted in Maine, Michigan, Vermont, and Massachusetts, that the defendants having acquired the possession of plaintiff's property by and through the tortious acts of Baux, and not otherwise, such possession was tortious from its commencement, and constituted a conversion of the plaintiff's property, for which she might at any time within three years thereafter have maintained an action without previously making any demand, and that the omission to commence an action within that time, constitutes a bar to this action."

See, also, 5 Cal. Jur. 172.

The evidence in the instant case, being obviously insufficient to support a title of adverse possession or prescription, renders it unnecessary to consider the question whether or not it was the intention of the Legislature, by the enactment of section 1007, Civil Code, that it should be applied to personal property. Said section reads:

"Occupancy for the period prescribed by the Code of Civil Procedure as sufficient to bar an action for the recovery of the property confers a title thereto, denominated a title by prescription, which is sufficient against all."

[5] Whether by the adoption of said section it was intended to include personal property or not, it is very clear that the section in nowise modifies or limits the effect of subdivision 3, section 338, Code of Civil Procedure. That subdivision authorizes the commencement of an action by the owner of personal property against a wrongful converter at any time within three years from the day that the wrongdoer receives the property into his possession. The acts of "taking," "detaining," etc., the property relate to the person who wrongfully has the property in his possession at the time the action is commenced against him, and the fact that others may have wrongfully possessed it for fragmentary portions of the statutory period, which, taken together, would exceed the period that bars the remedy, is not a defense of which the wrongdoer, who has not possessed the property for the full period of three years may avail himself. This construction seems to be in harmony with Harpending v. Meyer, 55 Cal. 555, and would afford some protection to persons as to their ownership of personal property which is of an ambulatory and movable character, and easy of concealment. Less baneful consequences would probably flow from a rule that would require a fixedness or stability of possession before an owner of property, without fault on his part, could be deprived of its use and enjoyment than that which would follow the confusion of "tacking" the possession of many holders of various durations, residing in various neighborhoods and with the situation further embarrassed by the difficulties of identification.

A careful examination of the decisions of this state has failed to disclose to our investigation a single case in which section 1007, Civil Code, has been applied to the acquisition of title to personal property. Said section has been cited and interpreted many times in cases involving the title to property real. In Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 456, 12 P. 491, this court, in interpreting said section, said:

"This section merely fixes the time in which a right by prescription shall be acquired, but does not alter the requisites which before the code were essential to the growth of a prescriptive right. Woodruff v. N. B. G. M. Co., ([C. C.] 18 F. 753) 9 Sawy. 441.

"The use must be adverse to the true owner. Anaheim W. Co. v. Semi-Tropic W. Co., 64 Cal. 185 (30 P. 623).

"If the use must be adverse then it must be accompanied by the elements required to make out an adverse possession."

See, also, Sullivan v. Zeiner, 98 Cal. 346, 33 P. 209, 20 L. R. A. 730; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 P. 379; People's Water Co. v. Anderson, 170 Cal. 683, 151 P. 127.

Said property was not taken from the possession of the original conditional purchaser for a tax, assessment or fine, or pursuant to any statute, and the title thereto could not have been transferred by her without the consent of the seller. Mrs. Rodgers never having acquired title by her possession and her successors in interest not having possessed or occupied said property for the period required by subdivision 3, section 338, supra, the privilege of the statute of limitations is not, therefore, available to the defendant as a defense to the action.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; WASTE, J.

MYERS, C. J. I concur. If, however, we should assume that section 1007 of the Civil Code applies to personal property, and that title to such property may therefore be acquired by prescription, I am not prepared to say that the occupancies of successive possessors who are in privity with one another could not be tacked for that purpose. That question is not necessary to be determined in this case, for the reason pointed out by Mr. Justice SEAWELL, that the essential elements of open and notorious adverse possession under claim of right coupled with payment of taxes, are wholly lacking herein.

1. Appeal and error ⟸113(3)—Proper appeal is from judgment, after order denying motion to vacate default judgment.

Where a default judgment is taken, and after motion to open up default, an order of judgment in accordance with proof is entered, the proper appeal is from the judgment, as no direct appeal lies from an order denying a motion to vacate default, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

2. Appeal and error ⟸957(1)—Judgment ⟸139—Ruling of trial court not disturbed on appeal, when no abuse of discretion is shown.

Action of trial court, in setting aside or granting relief from default judgment, rests largely in its discretion, and it will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears an abuse of the discretion.

3. Judgment ⟸143(12)—Refusal to set aside default judgment held not abuse of discretion by trial court.

Where summons and complaint were served December 6, 1922, and demurrer and motion for change of place of trial was served on plaintiff's attorney by mailing on January 5, 1923, a refusal by trial court to set aside default judgment taken on January 6, held not to be an abuse of discretion, notwithstanding defendant's contention of mistake and excusable neglect under impression that service could be made by deposit under Code Civ. Proc. § 1013.

4. Appeal and error ⟸659(4)—Diminution of record denied, where omitted papers immaterial.

Where affidavits used below were not included in the record on appeal, but would have added nothing to the showing made, diminution of the record will be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; M L. Short, Judge.

Action by E. F. Pickerill against Thomas Strain, Jr., doing business under the firm name and style of the National Fruit Exchange. Judgment for plaintiff, after denial of motion to open up default, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. Scott Jacobs, of Hanford, and Moore & Patterson, for appellant.

J. L. C. Irwin and Chas. E. Watkinson, both of Hanford, for respondent.

WASTE, J. A judgment, after default, was entered against the defendant, and he has appealed on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions which presents only the matters relating to the refusal of the lower court to set aside the default.

The plaintiff commenced an action in the superior court of Kings county and the defendant was served with complaint and summons in Los Angeles county on December 6, 1922, as he was about to depart from the state. The defendant returned to California on January 2, 1923. On January 5, demurrer to the complaint and papers on motion for a change of place of trial were served on the plaintiff's attorneys by mailing, and the originals, unaccompanied by any filing fees, were forwarded to the clerk of the court in which the action was pending. On the next day, January 6, the plaintiff, who is the county clerk of Kings county, noted the default of the defendant, and thereupon entered judgment in his own favor for the full amount prayed for in the complaint. On January 22, the defendant served affidavits and notice of motion to set aside the default and judgment on the ground of excusable neglect, and upon the further ground that plaintiff, as clerk of the court, was disqualified from entering either a default or a judgment. A countershowing was made by the plaintiff, and, upon due consideration, the court denied the motion to open the default, but made an order setting aside the judgment. Thereafter, according to the record, the action was "set down for trial * * * before the court sitting without a jury; whereupon witnesses on the part of the plaintiff were sworn and examined, and the evidence being closed, the cause was submitted to the court for consideration and decision," and judgment was ordered for the plaintiff in accord with the proof made. The defendant filed notice of appeal "from the judgment made and entered in said superior court in the above-entitled action on the 7th day of August, 1923, in favor of the plaintiff in said action and against the defendant, for the sum of $1,750.89 and costs, and from the whole thereof."

[1] The respondent urges, in opposition to a consideration of the appeal, the contention that appellant cannot be heard in support of his plea that the court erred in refusing to set aside his default, for the reason that no appeal has been taken from that order. There is no merit in the objection. No direct appeal lies fom an order denying a motion to vacate a default. Code Civ. Proc. § 963; Timmons v. Coonley, 39 Cal. App. 35, 179 P. 429. But, whether or not his default was properly entered is a question which appellant had a right to have adjudicated upon an appeal from the judgment. Ricketson v. Torres, 23 Cal. 636, 650; Maud v. Wear, 55 Cal. 25.

[2, 3] The motion to set aside the default was made upon the ground of surprise, mistake, and excusable neglect. According to the bill of exceptions, the only affidavit in support of the motion was one made by an attorney for the defendant in which he sets forth the pertinent facts already narrated, and the further allegation that "affiant had in mind the provisions of section 1013, Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California, which provides that a deposit in the mail is equivalent, and that service is had when deposit was made and affiant was under the impression that by the provisions of this section an appearance would also be had by deposit." It has been so often held as not to need citation of authorities that the action of the superior court upon an application to set aside a default, or grant relief therefrom, rests so largely in its discretion that it will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it shall be made clearly to appear that there was an abuse of the discretion. Ingrim v. Epperson, 137 Cal. 370, 70 P. 165. In this case the court did not err in refusing to open the default on the showing made. Hancock v. Pico, 40 Cal. 153.

[4] Appellant makes a suggestion of diminution of the record for the purpose of bringing to our attention the affidavits of the respondent and the deputy county clerk, both of which affidavits, he represents, were before the trial court, but neither of which is included in the record on appeal. There is nothing in the record to show that the affidavits were actually before the court on the application to open the default, but, assuming that they were, they add nothing to the very weak showing, otherwise made, in support of the motion.

Appellant complains that the judgment is excessive. The judgment recites that witnesses on the part of the plaintiff were sworn and examined, and the evidence being closed the cause was submitted. Appellant has not brought the evidence to this court. From an examination of the judgment roll, we find the case is one in the jurisdiction of the superior court, the complaint states a cause of action, the default of the defendant was duly entered, and the judgment is regular on its face.

For the reasons given, diminution of the record is denied.

Judgment affirmed.

JOHNSON v. KAESER et al. (Sac. 3620.)

1. Sales ⟹477(4)—Contract construed as conditional sale with option to retake property or sue for balance on default.

Contract for sale of personalty, reserving title in seller until performed, and giving him right on default in payment of installments to declare balance of purchase price due, and thereupon retake possession of property, is a conditional sales contract and gives seller option on buyer's breach to treat contract as a conditional sale and retake property or ratify contract as an absolute sale and sue for balance due.

2. Sales ⟹477(4)—Contract, giving seller option to retake property or sue for balance on default, does not require notice of election.

Contract for sale of personalty, reserving title in seller until performed, and giving seller right, on default by buyer, to sue for balance of purchase price or retake property requires no further notice to the defaulting party of election by seller to sue for balance of purchase price than the bringing of the action.

3. Evidence ⟹413—Contract provision for attorney fees binding so as to exclude proof of reasonable value.

Provision in contract, that if seller, on default of buyer, must employ an attorney, buyer is to pay "an additional sum equal to 10 per cent. of the purchase price" as attorney fees, is binding, unless unconscionable, and objection to proof of reasonable value of attorney's services was properly sustained.

4. Sales ⟹477(5)—Oral agreement to extend time for payment of installments waives provisions for payment in contract.

Under conditional sales contract payable in installments, an oral agreement to extend time for payment of installments of three months waived provisions of contract for payment and forfeiture clause as to installments.

5. Sales ⟹477(1)—Seller cannot declare forfeiture for nonperformance where he consents thereto.

A seller, under a conditional sales contract, cannot declare forfeiture for nonperformance by purchaser of terms of contract, where such nonperformance has been with express or implied consent of seller.

6. Frauds, statute of ⟹139(6)—Oral agreement to extend time of payment of installments, fully performed, not void under statute.

In a contract for payment by installments, oral agreements to extend time of payment of installments, fully performed by acceptance by seller of interest for extended time, are not void, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and Civ. Code, § 1661, as being oral, executory, and without consideration.

7. Estoppel ⟹55—Waiver of legal right implied, where party's acts mislead another to believe waiver intended and amounts to estoppel against him.

A waiver of legal right may be implied, where acts of party are such as to mislead another to believe that a waiver was intended and amounts to an estoppel against the former.

8. Evidence ⟹84—Check presumed tendered, as required by contract, where no evidence to contrary.

Under a contract, requiring payment by installments on the 1st day of each month, or within 10 days thereafter, where a check dated 8th of the month was tendered, it is presumed that it was tendered in time, there being no evidence to the contrary.

9. Forfeitures ⊂⊃2 — Statutes liberally construed to avoid forfeitures.

Forfeitures not being favored by the court, statutes authorizing them are to be liberally construed to avoid such penalties.

10. Sales ⊂⊃479(7)—Burden of proof, as to tender of check in time, on party declaring forfeiture.

In action on contract for failure to pay installments, burden of proving that check was not tendered in time, which fact was put in issue under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, is on party declaring contract forfeited, under rule requiring such party to bring himself clearly within conditions authorizing forfeiture.

11. Time ⊂⊃9(10) — Action brought on 11th day, under contract giving 10 days after 1st of month to pay, was premature.

Under a contract, providing that installments were to be paid on 1st day of each month, or "within 10 days thereafter," 10 days begins to run from 2d day of month, first day being excluded under Civ. Code, § 10, and Code Civ. Proc. § 12, and an action brought on 11th day was premature.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by F. E. Johnson against R. G. Kaeser and others. Fron a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Thos. B. Leeper and O. G. Hopkins, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

Charles B. Harris and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff brought this action to recover from defendants the total sum of $13,671 and interest, together with attorney's fee in the sum of $2,000, alleged to be due from the latter by virtue of the terms of a conditional contract of sale of certain personal property.

The cause was tried before a jury, and a directed verdict returned for the full amount prayed for in the complaint. Judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendants appeal.

The terms of the contract, in substance, and the payments thereunder made by the defendants, are correctly stated as follows in the brief of respondent:

"On June 28, 1922, respondent as seller, and appellants as purchasers, entered into a written contract for the sale and purchase of certain personal property used in the conduct of a dairy business and situated at No. 2935 Franklin boulevard in the city of Sacramento, Cal., a copy of which contract is annexed to the complaint and set out on pages 4 to 12 of the clerk's transcript. The agreed price was $20,000, payable $5,000 upon the signing of the contract, and the balance in monthly installments of not less than $300 on the 1st day of each and every month thereafter, beginning August 1, 1922, until the full amount had been paid, together with interest upon the deferred installments at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable monthly on the 1st day of each month. Said contract provides that the title to said personal property shall remain in the vendor until all of the payments therein provided for are made; that past-due payments shall bear interest at the rate of 1 per cent. per month; that should the vendees fail to make any of the said payments in the amounts, manner, and within the time therein provided for, or within 10 days thereafter, the vendor may declare the entire purchase price due and payable without notice; that in the event the vendor shall employ an attorney to collect any unpaid balances, the vendees promise to pay an additional sum equal to 10 per cent. of the purchase price of said personal property as and for attorney's fees, and that time is of the essence of the contract. * * *

"Thereafter, to wit: On July 1, 1922, appellants entered into the possession and took charge and control of the personal property described in said contract and the business theretofore conducted by respondent on the above-mentioned premises, and they ever since have been in the possession, management, and control thereof. The uncontradicted evidence shows that the following payments, and no other, were made on the following dates, to wit: August 14, 1922, $375; September 15, 1922, $373.50; October 14, 1922, $372; November 16, 1922, $70.50; December 16, 1922, $70.50; January 15, 1923, $70.50; February 16, 1923, $219.75; March 16, 1923, $219.75; April 19, 1923, $219.10."

The facts above stated are substantially alleged in the complaint. It is further therein averred that:

"On the 10th day of May, 1923, defendants were in arrears on the payments due on the principal in the sum of one thousand three hundred seventy-one and 15/100 ($1,371.15) dollars, no part of which has been paid; * * * that said plaintiff has been compelled to employ an attorney, and has so done, to represent him in this action, and he alleges that, under the terms of said contract, there is now due and payable from said defendants the sum of two thousand dollars as attorney's fees; that plaintiff now elects to treat said contract of sale as an absolute sale."

The contract is attached to, and made a part of, the complaint, and therein is set forth in detail the personal property sold or agreed to be sold and transferred to defendants.

A demurrer on the general ground was interposed to the complaint and overruled, whereupon the defendants filed an answer denying specifically the allegations of the complaint and setting up a special defense based upon an alleged waiver by plaintiff of the payment of installments referred to according to the requirements of the contract.

Defendants, also, by way of a cross-complaint, pleaded a counterclaim growing out of damage alleged to have been suffered by them by reason of alleged false and fraudulent representations by plaintiff as to the extent, value, volume, and profits of the dairy business which, it is further alleged, was sold to defendants by plaintiff with the personal property constituting the equipment of said business. In this connection, the cross-complaint charges that the plaintiff knowingly and fraudulently misrepresented to defendants, at the time the sale was under negotiation, the extent and profits of said business, which alleged fraud was not discovered by defendants until after the sale was consummated and they had taken possession, control, and management of said property and business; that they relied and acted upon and were induced to purchase said property and business by the representations so made to them by plaintiff, and paid to the latter for said property in excess of the actual and reasonable value thereof, the sum of $12,500, with the result that they were and are damnified in that amount; that, "upon discovering said fraud, these defendants affirmed said contract and offered to perform the same, and do now affirm and offer to, and are now able, ready, and willing, to carry out all its terms and conditions," etc. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint, specifically denying all its material averments.

It appears that, between the 1st and 10th day of November, 1922, and when the payment of the installment for the month of November, 1922, was due but still unpaid, the defendants called on and had an interview with the plaintiff with regard to said payment and also like payments to be made for the months of December, 1922, and January, 1923. As to the nature of the conversation then had by defendants with plaintiff, the testimony of each of the defendants was substantially the same and not contradicted. In fact, the plaintiff virtually admitted it to be true. The defendant Potter testified that they first said to plaintiff that, during the negotiations culminating in the sale, he had misrepresented the value and the extent of the business and the property which were the subject of the sale; that the business, for reasons not material to the present consideration, had not been as profitable during the period of time that it had been in their possession and under their control as he (plaintiff) had represented that it was while he controlled and managed it; that, therefore, they would not be able to meet the payments on the principal as required by the contract for the months of November and December, 1922, and January, 1923, and that "unless some adjustment was made he (plaintiff) could take the dairy business back"; that thereupon the plaintiff stated that the defendants need not "pay the principal for three months—that we could pay the interest alone— * * * the months of November, December, and January." Defendant Beskeen testified that plaintiff "agreed to extend the payment (of the installments for the months of November, December, and January) for three months. We were to pay the interest, but did not have to pay the principal."

Defendant Kaeser testified:

"I told Mr. Johnson (plaintiff) he had misrepresented the business—it was not paying what he said it would pay. He could take his d——n business back and his contract back. I said he misrepresented it; said he was getting $1.08 a case for the milk, which we found out was not true. Then Mr. Johnson says: 'It is a quiet time now, being it is winter time; in the spring it will probably be a whole lot better;' and I said we could not make the payment at the present time; that the business would not pay it. He said, 'Well,' he would extend the time for three months, and we would not have to make a payment on the principal, only pay the interest, and I said to run three months, November, December, and January."

Shortly prior to the maturing of the February, 1923, installment, the defendant Potter had a second conversation with plaintiff, in which the former stated to the latter that:

"We were unable, still unable, to make full monthly payment, and suggested we might make half payment. He (plaintiff) said that it would be all right and the matter mentioned was three months. * * * To make half payments for three months. There was nothing said concerning the other half payments for those months."

On April 18, 1923, acting for and on behalf of plaintiff by the latter's request, H. H. Robinson, cashier of the Merchants' National Bank, at which plaintiff transacted his business, addressed and mailed to the defendants, Beskeen and Potter, a letter in which he notified them of their arrears in the payments required by the contract in the sum of $1,371.15 and demanded payment of said sum "on or before ten days, or we will call upon Mr. R. G. Kaeser, cosigner on the agreement."

Under date of May 2, 1923, the attorney, then representing the plaintiff, addressed and mailed a letter to each of the three defendants demanding payment of the sum of $1,371.15, arrearages for the months of November and December, 1922, and the months of January, February, March, and April, 1923, and further notifying the defendants that, unless they paid said sum, together with interest which had accrued thereon, on or before the 10th day of May, 1923, he would "commence proceedings to collect the total due under the contract."

A few days after the date and mailing of the letter last referred to, and prior to the 10th day of May, 1923, the defendants met with the plaintiff and his attorney at the latter's office. On that occasion, so the plaintiff testified, after a general discussion relative to the installments unpaid for the months mentioned, the defendants proposed to give the plaintiff their promissory note covering the total sum ($1,371.15) of their arrearages; that to that proposition the plaintiff answered that he would accept such a note "if the bank would cash it for the full amount. I told them," proceeded plaintiff, "I wanted 24 hours to find that out. I went to the Citizens' Bank at Oak Park, where they (defendants) were already doing business and where I was doing business myself, and he could not tell me until he consulted the Capital National Bank." The plaintiff, on the succeeding day, again called at the Citizens' Bank, and was informed by the cashier that the bank would take the proposed note at a discount of $171.15, or, in other words, pay plaintiff $1,200 for the $1,371.15 note. The plaintiff thereupon refused to accept the note for said amount from the defendants.

A check, dated May 8, 1923, for the sum of $368.55, drawn by the defendants Beskeen and Potter on the Citizens' Bank, above mentioned, and in favor of the plaintiff, and covering the installment on the principal and interest for the month of May, 1923, was offered the plaintiff. The plaintiff refused to accept the payment thus tendered, and on the 11th day of May, 1923, brought this action to recover on the contract by reason of the alleged defaults of the defendants in the matter of the payment of the installments as provided thereby.

Before considering and disposing of what is conceived to be the pivotal question on this appeal, under the facts as they are above stated, and which stand in the record undisputed, we may, with propriety, in view of possible future litigation growing out of the contract upon which this action was brought, make some observations relative to certain points discussed in the briefs of counsel representing both sides of the controversy and upon which they disagree.

[1] The contract herein involved is undoubtedly a conditional sale agreement. It provides, as will be noted, that the title to the property which is the subject thereof shall remain in the seller until the full amount of the purchase price shall have been paid. It also provides, as is further to be noted, that on default in the payment of the installments of principal and interest the seller may declare the entire purchase price, or so much thereof as then remains unpaid, due and payable, and may thereupon retake possession of the property. It is settled by an unbroken line of decisions that, as to such a contract, it is optional with the seller, upon default by the purchaser in complying with any of the vital terms of the agreement, either to treat the contract as involving a conditional sale and retake possession of the property or ratify the contract as one involving an absolute sale of the property and so sue for the recovery of all moneys then payable thereunder. In other words, the seller in such case is vested with the right to exercise an election as between the two remedies suggested. See Parke & Lacy Co. v. White River L. Co., 101 Cal. 37, 40, 35 P. 442; Elsom v. Moore et al., 11 Cal. App. 377, 379, 105 P. 271; George J. Birkel Co. v. Nast, 20 Cal. App. 651, 654, 129 P. 945; Pac., etc., Co. v. Haydes & Son, 26 Cal. App. 607, 609, 147 P. 988; Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 356, 42 P. 435; Van Allen v. Francis, 123 Cal. 474, 480, 56 P. 339; Harter v. Delno, 49 Cal. App. 729, 735, 194 P. 300, 303; Boas v. Knewing, 175 Cal. 226, 165 P. 690, L. R. A. 1917F, 462. The text-writers lay down the same rule. (See 1 Mechem on Sales, § 615; Williston on Sales, § 579.)

[2] Furthermore, no notice to the defaulting parties of his election to treat the sale as absolute and sue for the recovery of the purchase price is required to be given by the seller. The provisions of the contract that the title to the property shall remain in the seller until the full amount of the purchase price has been paid, and that, upon default by defendants to pay the purchase price as prescribed in the agreement, the seller may retake possession of the same, were inserted in the instrument for the purpose of securing such payment and were intended solely for the benefit of the vendor. It was, therefore, within the rights of the latter to waive those provisions and treat the sale as absolute or unconditional and so proceed with the enforcement of the terms of the agreement without any further notice to the defendants of his intention to do so than such as necessarily is imparted by the institution of an action to recover upon the contract. See Trinity County Bank et al. v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 556, 91 P. 385; Hewitt v. Dean, 91 Cal. 5, 27 P. 423; Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 P. 220; Clemens v. Luce, 101 Cal. 432, 35 P. 1032; Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 P. 451.

[3] The defendants, objecting to the claim of plaintiff that he was entitled to recover as and for attorney's fees the sum of $2,000 for professional services in collecting the amount due him on the contract, offered to prove the reasonable value of such services, but the court sustained plaintiff's objection to the proposed proof. The contract, as seen, provides that if the seller shall be required to employ the services of an attorney for the collection of any unpaid balance which becomes due and payable under the agreement, the purchaser "promises to pay (to the seller) * * * an additional sum equal to 10 per cent. of the purchase price." The theory upon which testimony as to the reasonable value of the services of the attorney was excluded was that the parties themselves had, by the contract, definitely fixed the amount to be paid for such services. We think the ruling was correct. Reynolds v. Sorosis Fruit Co., 133 Cal. 625, 66 P. 21. As is said in that case, in effect, even if the amount agreed upon as compensation was in excess of the value of the services rendered and thus the defendants made an improvident agreement as to the amount so to be paid, they are nevertheless, still bound by their bargain in that respect. There may be cases or circumstances arising in cases in which such fees as fixed by the contract of the parties could, and with justness, be held to be so unreasonable as to be unconscionable, and, therefore, unsustainable, but it cannot justly be so declared in this instance, in view of the amount remaining unpaid on the contract and the circumstances generally surrounding the transactions leading to this action.

We now proceed to the consideration of the points, the solution of which will be decisive of the case. The plaintiff presented his case in the court below and undertakes to sustain this appeal upon the theory that the oral arrangements entered into between the parties as to the payment of the installments for the months of November and December, 1922, and January, February, March, and April, 1923, merely involved agreements that the payment of said installments was to be postponed until the expiration of the period covered by said six months. In other words, the contention is that the intended effect of said agreements was that payment of said installments was extended for six months only, just as the payment of a promissory note might be extended by the payee or holder to some date beyond that of its maturity. Under this view of the oral agreements as shown by the testimony of the defendants, it is further argued that said agreements were void for two reasons, viz: (1) That the alleged agreements involved an attempt to modify, vary, or change a written contract, and not themselves being in writing and also being of an executory character, they are void, or legally incapable of being proved and enforced. Section 1856, Code Civ. Proc.; section 1661, Civ. Code. (2) That, even if the agreements were not void for the reason just stated, still neither agreement was supported by a consideration, and each for that reason was a nudum pactum and, therefore, void.

[4] Conceding that the testimony warrants the conclusion, as the plaintiff contends, that the agreements were that the payment of the installments for the months mentioned should be postponed to a time contemporaneous with the expiration of the period covering six months, it is, nevertheless, true, as the defendants maintain, that the legal effect of the agreements, on plaintiff's part, was to waive the payment, as the contract requires, of the installment for each of the months mentioned; that there having been no agreement, express or otherwise, to the contrary, such waiver necessarily, or in the very nature of the case, carried with it, as to the said installments, a like waiver of the provisions of the contract that time is of the essence thereof and, consequently, of the forfeiture clause of the contract enforceable only upon default by defendants to make the monthly installment payments according to the stipulations of the contract, or on their failure to comply with any of the other vital or material terms or conditions of the contract. See Van Vranken v. C. R. & M. R. Co., 55 Iowa, 135, 5 N. W. 197, 7 N. W. 504; see, also, on the question of waiver, Belloc v. Davis, 38 Cal. 242; Trinity County Bank et al. v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 P. 385; Weinke v. Smith, 179 Cal. 225, 176 P. 42.

[5] This conclusion, as to the legal effect or scope of the waiver, is the essential corollary of the proposition that the seller, under a conditional contract for the sale of property, will not be permitted to declare a forfeiture of the rights of the purchaser under such contract for nonperformance by the latter of any of the vital terms or conditions of the writing, where such nonperformance has been with the express or clearly evinced tacit or implied consent of the seller. As is well said in Neppach v. Oregon R. Co., 46 Or. 396, 80 P. 487, 7 Ann. Cas. 1039, treating with a contract somewhat similar to the one here:

"It would certainly be unreasonable to hold, under such circumstances, that the defendant can now insist upon a forfeiture of the contract on account of the failure to make such payments. 'We know of no principle of law,' says Mr. Chief Justice Andrews, in Thomson v. Poor, 147 N. Y. 402, 42 N. E. 13, 'which will permit a party to a contract, who is entitled to demand the performance by the other party of some act within a specified time, and who has consented to the postponement of the performance to a time subsequent to that fixed by the contract, and where the other party has acted upon such consent, and in reliance thereon has permitted the contract time to pass without performance, to subsequently recall such consent and treat the nonperformance within the original time as a breach of the contract.' The same principle is announced by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Marsh v. Bellew, 45 Wis. 36, 52."

[6] In the present instance, it is, of course, true that when made both the oral agreements were executory as to all the installments to which they related (save, perhaps, that for the month of November, 1922, as to which installment the first agreement was then or at the time it was made executed), and, being oral, and, moreover, unsupported by consideration (Benedict v. Greer-Robbins Co., 26 Cal. App. 468, 147 P. 486), neither could have been coercively enforced at the time the installment for any of the months named became payable under the contract—that is to say, the plaintiff, before executing the agreements, could not have been compelled to do so. But he acted upon and carried out the agreements as to the payments for all the months named, as each of the installments for said months matured, by accepting from defendants as in satisfaction of the provision as to their payment interest only for the first three months and one-half of the installment and interest for each of the second three months. Thus the agreements of waiver were executed and so became perfectly valid. In other words, the agreements were fully performed. Civ. Code, § 1661. But whether it is to be said that the agreements became executed express agreements of waiver or that by conduct, consisting of said agreements and subsequent acts with reference to the payment of said installments, a waiver arose by implication, the result would be the same.

[7] Obviously, a waiver of a legal right may be implied as well as express, and while it is manifestly true that there can be no presumption of such a waiver contrary to the plain or clear intention of the party whose rights would be injuriously affected by reason thereof, yet it is no less true that where the conduct or the acts of the party whose rights would thus be affected by a waiver have been such as to mislead the other party, to his prejudice, into the honest belief that a waiver was intended or consented to, then such conduct or acts will be held sufficient to work an estoppel as against the former. In other words, a presumptive waiver of a legal right may be shown by proving a clear, unequivocal, and decisive act of the party "showing such a purpose or acts amounting to an estoppel." 27 R. C. L. p. 908 et seq., § 5; First Nat. Bank of Los Angeles v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 55 P. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64. As before pointed out, there is no foundation in the evidence for a rational doubt that the acts and conduct of the plaintiff with reference to the installments in question were not only sufficient to raise an implied waiver of the payment thereof, as required by the contract, and, therefore, an estoppel as against him, but also clearly show that it was his purpose or intention to waive such payments at the times stipulated in the instrument.

It results from the foregoing considerations that the plaintiff was without authority to declare the contract or the rights of defendants thereunder forfeited by reason of the nonpayment of those installments, since, as we have shown, there was not, and, under the circumstances, there could not be, any default on the part of the defendants within the contemplation of the contract by reason of their nonpayment of the same as stipulated therein. It follows that, if the plaintiff has any legal reason for declaring the contract or the rights of the defendants thereunder forfeited, it must be found in a failure by the defendants either to comply with some other material provision or condition of the engagement or in defaulting in the payment of an installment or installments or accrued interest for some month or months succeeding the month of April, 1923, and this, the plaintiff further contends, is what occurred. The contention is founded upon the claim that the defendants defaulted in the payment of the installment on principal and the interest thereon for the month of May, 1923. The complaint does not specifically charge such default, but tender of payment of the May installment is affirmatively alleged in the answer and is deemed to be denied by the plaintiff (Code Civ. Proc. § 462), and without objection evidence was received upon the question of such tender. The point will, therefore, be considered. There is, however, no merit to the point.

The contract, as seen, provides that:

"Should the purchasers fail to make any of the said payments to said seller, in amounts, manner, and within the time herein provided for (the 1st day of each month, or within 10 days thereafter), * * * said seller may declare the entire purchase price due and payable, without notice," etc.

As also seen, the plaintiff was tendered by the defendants a check, dated the 8th day of May, 1923, covering and as in payment of the full amount of the principal and interest payable on the 1st day of May, 1923, or "within 10 days thereafter." (It should here be explained that, while the check in question as printed in the transcript bears date, May 18, 1923, counsel for defendants, on offering it in evidence, stated that it was dated the 8th day of May, 1923, and this statement was not disputed—in fact, it was admitted by counsel for plaintiff that the "8th day of May, 1923," was the correct date, and that the date it is made to appear to bear in the record is a mistake.) The plaintiff refused to accept the check. It does not appear that the objection of plaintiff to the acceptance of the payment so tendered was on the ground that it was in the form of a check rather than in cash. Calif. Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, etc., 40 Cal. App. 246, 254, 180 P. 625. Indeed, it appears that all monthly payments, made prior to the month of November, 1922, were by check. The evidence, however, does not show the date of the tender of the check. The plaintiff testified that the check was sent to his attorney, and that he (plaintiff) saw it at some time subsequent to the day it was dated, just at what time he could not say. So there is no direct evidence that the check was tendered to plaintiff within the 10 days after the 1st day of May, within which time his tender would be good, nor is there any evidence that it was not so tendered.

[8, 9] The fact that the contract requires that the monthly payments be made on the 1st day of each month or within 10 days thereafter, and the further fact that the check was dated May 8th, constitute some evidence of a circumstantial character that the check was tendered within due time. In fact, it is to be presumed that the check was tendered to plaintiff within the time at or within which monthly installments were required by the contract to be made, there being no evidence that it was not so tendered. Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subd. 19; Lattin v. Hazard, 85 Cal. 58, 61, 24 P. 611. Again, forfeitures are never favored by courts of law or equity. Statutes authorizing them are to be liberally construed so as to avoid the imposition of such penalties, if consistently with all the circumstances of the case it may be done. 12 Cal. Juris., p. 633 et seq., and cases therein named.

[10] A party to a contract authorized thereby, upon the happening of a certain contingency, to declare as forfeited the rights of the other party thereto, must bring himself clearly within the condition or conditions upon which such forfeiture may be made effective. Hence, under the circumstances shown, upon the plaintiff rested the burden to show, if such was the fact, that the check in question was not tendered at or within the time required by the contract. This burden, as we have shown, was not sustained, nor, in fact, undertaken by plaintiff.

[11] There is another point well taken by the defendant, which, though, goes to the right of the plaintiff in any event to maintain this action on the alleged default in the payment of the May installment, viz.: That the action was prematurely brought. The installments were due and payable on the 1st day of each month, or "within 10 days thereafter." Thus the defendants, by the terms of the contract, had all of the 11th day of May, 1923, to pay the installment for said month. In other words, the 10 days began to run after the 1st day of the month, or on the 2d day thereof, the 1st day of the month being excluded in the computation of the time. Civ. Code, § 10; Code Civ. Proc., § 12. But regardless of said sections, the language itself of the contract as to the times at which the installments are to be paid clearly and, indeed, unquestionably, in effect declares that the 10 days were not to begin to run until the 2d day of May. The action was brought on the 11th day of May, the last day of the 10; hence the defendants, before action brought, were not given the full 10 days to which they were entitled within which to make the May payment. The bringing of the action was, therefore, premature.

There are no other points which it is conceived merit special notice herein.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment is reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 10, 1925.)

1. Master and servant ⟹388—Dependency determined as of date of injury.

In claim by dependent for compensation for death of employee, condition of dependency as being entire or partial and extent thereof is determined as of date of injury.

2. Master and servant ⟹405(5)—Evidence held to justify finding of total dependency.

In claim by dependent sister for compensation, evidence that she was contributing in upkeep of home with decedent, but had been unemployed for three months prior to accident, and had found work a few days thereafter, justified a finding of condition of total dependency at time of accident so as to sustain an award under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 9.

3. Master and servant ⟹405(5)—Evidence held not to show mere temporary dependency.

A dependent sister claiming compensation, who was unemployed for three months prior to accident but found work three days thereafter, is not in temporary condition of dependency only, since it is open to inference that but for death of brother dependency might have continued indefinitely, and it not being required that person be physically or mentally incapable of self-support to be dependent.

In Bank.

Certiorari to Industrial Accident Commission.

Petition by the Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, insurer, against the Industrial Accident Commission, John A. McGilvray and another, Commissioners, for certiorari to review an order of the Commission awarding compensation to Katherine F. Sampson, claimant, for death of her brother, Dudley Sampson. Writ denied.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Acc. Commission.

WASTE, J. A petition to have this proceeding heard in the Supreme Court after decision and judgment in the District Court of Appeal was granted for the reason that the principal question here presented and involved in the case of Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191

Cal. 724, 218 P. 1009, relied on by the District Court of Appeal as authority for its conclusion, was, in effect, under reconsideration in a proceeding in certiorari, instituted in this court after a second award made by the Commission in that case. The facts are fully stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, which we have adopted as our own. The sole question presented by the application for a writ of review is the sufficiency of the evidence taken before the Industrial Accident Commission to sustain its finding that the applicant for compensation, a sister of the deceased employee, was wholly dependent upon him for her support.

[1] This court has held in a number of cases, including the decision supra, relied on by the District Court of Appeal, that the question of the condition of dependency, as being entire or partial, must be determined as of the date of the injury to the employee, and also that the extent of dependency should be fixed as of that date. Spreckels v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 256, 259, 199 P. 8; Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., supra; Market Street Ry. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 178, 182, 224 P. 95, and (just recently) Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm.. (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 662. It follows, therefore, that if the evidence before the respondent Commission supports the finding of total dependency, the award in an amount equal to three times the average annual earnings of the decedent was properly made. Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 836) § 9. We are satisfied that the District Court of Appeal has correctly disposed of the question, and we therefore adopt the opinion of Mr. Presiding Justice Conrey, concurred in by Mr. Justice Curtis and Mr. Justice Houser:

"One Katherine F. Sampson presented to the Industrial Accident Commission her claim for compensation as a dependent of her brother, Dudley Sampson, whose death resulted from an injury received while working as an employee of the California Country Club. The Industrial Accident Commission having made its final award, the employer's insurance carrier brings this proceeding to have the award annulled.

"The amount allowed to the claimant was computed on the basis of total dependency of the applicant. The only question presented herein arises out of petitioner's claim that the evidence wholly fails in proof of such dependency.

[2] "The petition sets forth the entire testimony, together with the admissions and stipulations received at the hearing before the Commission. From this evidence the following facts appear: The death of Dudley Sampson occurred on August 12, 1924, and resulted from an accident which occurred that day. At that time the claimant was living with her brother in a home which they had established together. From the beginning of the year 1924 until the second week in May she had been employed and had paid an equal share with her brother in their common living expenses and in the monthly installments payable on the purchase price of the house where they lived. During the second week in May her employment ceased for the reason that she was 'out of work.' At that time she had no money, and had no property except that she had an interest in the premises where they lived, which property was not fully paid for. From the second week in May until after her brother's death she continued to be unemployed, and received all of her support from moneys contributed by her brother. A few days after his death she again went to work. The evidence does not show what her occupation was or how much she earned then or thereafter.

"We are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to justify the Commission in finding the condition of total dependency at the time of the accident. In the case of Great Western Power Company of California v. Industrial Accident Commission, 191 Cal. 724, 730 [218 P. 1009], the Supreme Court quoted the provisions of the statute applicable to this question, and held, referring to the matter of dependency of certain brothers and sisters of the decedent, that the fact of their dependency and the degree thereof must be determined 'in accordance with the existing fact at the time of the injury.'

[3] "Counsel for petitioner suggests 'that the condition of dependency, if any, was a temporary one and not continuing, and, in fact, only existing by reason of a shortage of work, and in no way related to the physical, mental or social condition of his sister.' The evidence, however, is open to the inference that, except for the death of her brother, the condition of dependency of the claimant might have continued indefinitely. 'There is nothing in the act requiring that a person must be physically or mentally incapable of supporting himself in order to be adjudged a dependent.' Peterson v. Industrial Accident Commission, 188 Cal. 15, at page 18 [204 P. 390]. On the following page of the same decision, referring to the fact that the applicants obtained employment subsequent to the death of the person upon whom they were dependent, the court said that this fact could have no bearing upon the state of their dependency 'at the time of the injury of the employee,' but must be regarded only as the performance of an act of necessity to enable them to live."

The petition for the writ is denied.

Under certain circumstances, as where parent is of great age or enfeebled, child as grantee of parent has burden to show that deed was obtained without fraud or undue influence.

11. Deeds ⟸72(7)—Want of independent advice to mother making conveyance to son held not to invalidate deed.

Where deed from mother to son was made freely, voluntarily, and with full understanding of all facts and effect of transfer, it was not necessary to validity of deed that grantor acted on independent advice.

12. Deeds ⟸17(1)—Want of security for note given as part consideration for deed held no grounds for attack on validity thereof.

That note given by son to mother as part consideration for deed sought to be canceled was unsecured is no grounds for attack on validity of deed where note was acceptable and there was no intimation that it was not of full value or its maker not solvent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Elmira J. Wilbur against Glen A. Wilbur and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank McGowan and Blaine McGowan, both of San Francisco, and Lawrence Schillig and A. H. Hewitt, both of Yuba City, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. Mrs. Hazel Wilbur, wife of codefendant Glen A. Wilbur, who was made a party to the suit, appeared and filed her answer, in which she disclaimed all right, title, estate, and interest in and to the lands, premises, and personal property or thing involved in the action.

Plaintiff and appellant, Elmira J. Wilbur, is the mother of Glen A. Wilbur, defendant and respondent herein. The real property, the transfer of which it is claimed by the appellant was fraudulently made, as will later appear, and which is the basis of the action, was a part of a larger estate originally acquired by A. H. Wilbur, husband of appellant and father of respondent, deceased since 1898. Besides respondent Glen A. Wilbur there are three other children, issue of said A. H. Wilbur, since deceased, and his said wife, Elmira J. Wilbur, plaintiff and appellant, to wit, Edith Mary Wilbur, Lloyd H. Wilbur, and Elaine May Wilbur. Glen A. Wilbur is the youngest member of the family. The estate or lands in question are situate in Sutter county, some four or five miles northerly from Yuba City. In 1858, that being also the year that A. H. Wilbur and appellant were married, the husband purchased the lands involved in this action, and he and his wife went upon them to reside. Other acreages were thereafter added to the original purchase, and the value of the entire estate of A. H. Wilbur at the time of his death, 1898, was inventoried at $110,000. The greater portion of his estate consisted of land. There was some money and bank stock in the estate; the amount thereof is not stated and is not important here. By the decree of distribution one-half of the entire estate was distributed to the widow, appellant herein, and the other one-half was distributed to the four children in equal shares. Presumably by partition proceedings, Edith Wilbur became the owner of the particular parcels which are the subject of this action. On January 29, 1913, Mrs. Elmira J. Wilbur, the mother of said children and appellant herein, and her son, Glen A. Wilbur, respondent, purchased said land from Edith, paying her $40,000 in cash (each paying $20,000) and assumed an existing mortgage thereon in the sum of $18,000. By this purchase each became the owner of an undivided one-half interest therein. The above conveyance also carried with it a transfer of all the personal property on said premises, which consisted of approximately 20,000 raisin trays, 6,000 fruit boxes, cultivating machinery, farming implements, 12 horses and mules, wagons, household furniture, kitchen utensils, men's quarters, pumps, and motors and dry-yard cars for carrying raisin trays. The condition and state of preservation of said raisin trays, fruit boxes, machinery, and farming implements and other personal property at the time of sale was considered by the witnesses who testified as to valuations, and that subject will not be treated separately by us, inasmuch as the personal and real property was considered together in estimating the value of the premises. The lands, at the time respondent and appellant acquired ownership thereof, were and since have been, devoted exclusively to the raising of Thompson seedling grapes and the production of prunes, which crops were processed, cured, prepared, and made ready for the market on the premises. Other crops, such as are sometimes planted on orchard or grape lands incidental to the main business, were also occasionally produced in relatively small quantities. It was for the purpose of conducting the premises along the lines of industry above pointed out as a partnership enterprise that the purchase of said premises and personal property was made. The copartnership relation continued from January 29, 1913, to October 22, 1916, on which last-named day respondent purchased from his mother all of her interest of whatsoever kind in and to said real and personal property and the business which they had formerly conducted. Primarily this action was brought to obtain a decree of court canceling and declaring void the deed executed on said 22d of October, 1916, wherein appellant is grantor and respondent grantee, and also to declare void certain agreements and contracts entered into on the same day which may in anywise affect her rights in the premises, for rescission and restoration, and for a decree adjudging her to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the McKenzie ranch, containing about 40 acres, the title to which stands in the name of respondent, but which property, it is claimed, was purchased by partnership funds, and for an accounting and general relief.

The grounds upon which appellant relies as sufficient to sustain her right to have said conveyance set aside and to obtain the other relief sought will appear from the following epitomization of appellant's complaint: It is in four counts. The first count alleges an equal partnership in the premises acquired by the deed of 1913, and that respondent was appellant's agent in selling her portion of the crops raised on said land during the existence of their copartnership, and that defendant had the exclusive control and management of said premises and the marketing of said crops; that on October 22, 1916, the day said deed was executed, appellant was of the age of 68 years, and then was, for some time prior thereto had been, in poor health and was highly nervous and greatly weakened in body and mind; that respondent took her to the office of his attorney, Mr. Blaine McGowan, and by insistence and coercive and persuasive words, conduct, and methods, overcame her better judgment and induced her to execute the deed of October 22, 1916; that she had no independent counsel or advice whatsoever in the matter nor any opportunity to confer with any person other than respondent and his said attorney; that the reasonable value of said land was then not less than $65,000; that she received the sum of $5,000 and the promissory note of respondent for $20,000 in payment for her property, which note has not been paid as the consideration therefor. A tender of all moneys received by her on account of the transaction and a refusal by respondent to accept the same is pleaded as of date October, 1917. The allegations of the second count are substantially to the effect that respondent failed and neglected to render true accounts of the income derived from said lands during the existence of their said ownership and copartnership, and represented it to be much less in value than it was in fact, and that respondent retained each year a large portion of the share that rightfully belonged to appellant, exceeding in amount $125,000; that respondent was informed as to the income and value of said lands, but that she was not informed as to either; that she believed his representations that her interest in said lands would not exceed the value of $25,000, when, as a matter of fact, its true value was in excess of $65,000; that because of her great love and affection for respondent and because of the trust and faith she had in him she believed these and other false representations and acted upon them to her damage. A tender of all she received from respondent in said transaction and a refusal of the latter to accept the same made prior to the commencement of the action is alleged. The allegation of count 3 is that no accounting had ever been made by respondent to appellant, and she prays that he be compelled to render a report and account. By count 4 it is alleged that the respondent purchased with partnership funds the premises known as the McKenzie ranch and holds the legal title in himself. Appellant claims that she is the owner of an undivided one-half interest therein, and prays for an order directing respondent to convey said interest to her.

The fraudulent acts and conduct alleged to have been resorted to by respondent as a means of inducing or procuring the execution of the deed dated October 22, 1916, or the employment of any false or fraudulent representations made by him as to any matter or thing relating to the transactions as unduly affecting or influencing the action or conduct of appellant as alleged in the several counts of the complaint, whether said misrepresentations or wrongful acts or conduct be charged as suppressions or concealments of existing facts about which appellant was entitled to be informed, or whether said wrongful acts or conduct are alleged to consist in the employment of persuasion, solicitation, or deceit with a purpose of overreaching appellant, who, it is claimed, was infirm in mind and body, are specifically and separately denied. It is affirmatively alleged in the answer that appellant was under no physical, mental, or legal disability, and was not ill or infirm in mind or body at any time during the full period covered by the transactions described in the complaint, and that no undue or unfair advantage was taken of her in any manner or at any time, but that she acted in each instance freely, voluntarily, knowingly, and advisedly.

In addition to the aforementioned specific denials, the offer to rescind is challenged as to the promptness with which it was made and as to the sufficiency of the amount of money offered in restoration of the moneys paid out by respondent (pursuant to the agreement of the parties) in liquidation of claims aggregating a very large indebtedness against the partnership business, including taxes amounting to about $800 and a mortgage incumbrance amounting to approximately $12,229.58. It is not pretended by appellant that a tender was made purporting to cover the payments of said outstanding indebtedness, taxes and incumbrances, as a court of equity, it is claimed, in the circumstances of the instant case, will excuse a tender. The bar of the statute, section 338, subd. 4, Code of Civil Procedure, is pleaded against each count or cause of action. It is further urged as a bar to this action that a judgment of dismissal was made and entered in the superior court in and for the county of Sutter on November 24, 1919, in an action commenced in that court on November 20, 1917, wherein it is alleged that the grounds which constituted the cause of action in that case are the same grounds relied upon to constitute a cause of action in the instant case, demanding the same relief and between the same parties. It is admitted by the answer that respondent and appellant were owners as tenants in common of the land conveyed to them by deed dated January 29, 1913, and were copartners in the business of raising grapes and fruits until October 22, 1916, on which day the copartnership was terminated. It is alleged by way of answer that the ownership of said lands as tenants in common was voluntarily terminated November 27, 1914, by an instrument executed by respondent and appellant, whereby their respective tenures were converted into a joint tenancy with the right of survivorship.

The trial court found against appellant and in favor of respondent upon every material issue made by the pleadings or presented at the trial. The appeal is before us upon a bill of exceptions, the sufficiency and completeness of which is open to the serious objections made to it by respondent upon several specified grounds. The record is brought here in piecemeal fashion, portions of it being printed and other portions being typewritten, and it lacks orderly and convenient arrangement. Nevertheless, we have taken the pains to examine it. The fact that the appellant is represented to be in an impecunious position has inclined us not to regard too critically the objections made by respondent as to the deficiencies in appellant's specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. We repeat, however, that the record comes dangerously near being vulnerable to the objections made as to its insufficiency and incompleteness.

[1-3] The findings of the trial court upon conflicting evidence are conclusive, and all reasonable inferences are to be indulged in support of the findings. Treadwell v. Nickel, 194 Cal. 243, 261, 228 P. 25. The burden is upon appellant who claims error to show its existence. Hayne on New Trial and Appeal (Rev. Ed.) § 285, p. 1576, and cases cited. Where two or more inferences may reasonably be deduced from a certain state of facts or circumstances, a reviewing court is not permitted to substitute its deductions for those of the trial court.

The present action was commenced March 20, 1920, three years and a few months after the execution of the deed which is here attempted to be set aside on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained. We will refer briefly to that portion of the evidence in the case which supports the findings of the trial court:

Appellant had been familiar with and resided upon the premises in question since 1858; she had assisted in planting them to vines and trees, and had farmed and cultivated them generally. She also had a personal knowledge of the quality of the soil and the uses to which it was best adapted, and was at all times informed as to the value of said land and of land values in that vicinity generally. The evidence indicates that Mrs. Wilbur was at all times an active and rather keen-sighted woman with progressive and speculative tendencies. Many years of her life were spent at the Wilbur home in Sutter county. In about 1910 she took up her residence in San Francisco, but kept herself informed, by visits to the farm, correspondence, and through other channels of information, as to the management of the ranch and the conduct of the business in connection therewith. Her son, Glen, it seems to be conceded, was a hard-working, economical young man, who was unusually attentive to the business of the partnership enterprise, and had, according to numerous letters written by the mother, made many personal sacrifices and endured hardships uncomplainingly to the end that the enterprise might become a profitable investment. He not only carried the burden of husbandry, but it also devolved upon him to weather several financial storms. It is true that the mother assisted him by her advice and counsel, and upon several occasions advanced money from her own personal estate, but the greater burdens fell upon the son. The mother and son seemed to have been in perfect accord and harmony in all their business relations until she and the daughter Edith became interested in the purchase of a four-story hotel or apartment house situate on Bush street, in San Francisco. On October 9, 1916, appellant and Edith submitted to one Thomas O'Day an offer in exchange for said Bush street hotel a list of properties consisting of a 40-acre farm situate in Yolo county, a residence property situate in the city of Santa Cruz, five lots situate in the city of Richmond, and $5,000 in cash or negotiable paper at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. The Bush street property was incumbered with a $30,000 mortgage, which Mrs. Wilbur and her daughter Edith proposed to assume. On the day following said offer Thomas O'Day accepted it in writing. Ten days were reserved by Mrs. Wilbur and her daughter from the day of O'Day's acceptance in which to furnish a marketable title to their properties. This would carry forward the last day for exchange of deeds to October 20, 1916.

In contemplation of said exchange of properties, Mrs. Wilbur, on October 19, 1916, demanded of her son that he send her at least $2,000 immediately. This money was to be applied as the agreement of exchange provided. She had earlier in the month received $500 from respondent. The son strenuously opposed the purchase of the hotel by her as thus mortgaged. He felt that she was undertaking a project beyond her strength and ability to handle, and eventually she would lose everything and her interest in the ranch would most likely become entangled and eventually fall into the hands of persons who might not be acceptable to him as partners in the business or as tenants in common in the ownership of the property. Encouraged by her daughter Edith, the mother insisted that the son meet her demand, and, in the event that he did not, she had resolved to incumber her interest in the ranch to enable her to complete the purchase. After much discussion on the subject the mother reduced her demand to $1,250 cash, together with a request for a deed of the son's interest in a 40-acre Yolo county farm, which interest was valued at $250. This demand was complied with. Following the demands of the mother and her expressed intentions as to the purchase of the hotel, respondent related the whole matter to his sister Elaine, who was then at his home, and to Mr. J. W. Eager, and to his brother, Lloyd H. Wilbur, also to Mr. George Boyd, cashier of the First National Bank of Sutter county, and expressed to them his misgivings as to the ultimate result, and advised with them as to what he should do. After said consultation he decided to go to San Francisco on the following morning. He then called up Mr. Blaine McGowan and advised him that he had arrived at the point where he felt that he would have to sever his business connections with his mother, and that he was coming to San Francisco prepared to sell his interest. Respondent arrived in San Francisco at about 12 o'clock, Saturday, October 21, 1919, and made a number of attempts during the afternoon to reach his mother by telephone, but, failing therein, he proceeded to her residence and found no one at her home. He visited Mr. Blaine McGowan at his law offices and instructed him to prepare a deed conveying the mother's interest to him, and to prepare one or two papers which had the effect, so it was thought, of converting the title by which the property was held, to wit, a joint tenancy, back to a tenancy in common, and to prepare one or two other subsidiary papers or documents. He made an appointment with Mr.

Blaine McGowan, who was a mutual friend of the family and who had performed legal services for several members of the family, including Mrs. Wilbur, to meet him at his office on the following day, where he would bring his mother and attempt to close up the transaction which had brought him to San Francisco. He went to his mother's home in San Francisco the following morning, arriving at about 8 o'clock. He remained at the home for a short time, and invited his mother to ride with him in his automobile. They took up the business that had brought the son to San Francisco and discussed it for several hours. The mother decided to sell. They then proceeded to Mr. McGowan's office to close the transaction.

The proposition submitted by the son was that one should sell to the other at the fixed sum of $25,000, the purchaser to retain all moneys due the partnership and assume all the indebtedness. The transaction was discussed in all of its details by them in private and also in the presence of Mr. McGowan and Mr. Samuels, the notary. The latter was a stranger to all the parties, including Mr. McGowan, and his services were secured simply because he chanced to be accessible. The son was prepared to pay the full amount in cash, but the mother preferred that he should pay $5,000 by check and give a one-year note for $20,000, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable each and every month thereafter. This being agreeable to the son, the transaction was completed, and no dissatisfaction was found with the price or the manner in which the bargain had been consummated until the mother had talked it over with her daughter Edith shortly thereafter, and both came to the conclusion that the price was inadequate and the mother had been "cheated." It is quite convincing from the testimony that both Mrs. Wilbur and her daughter Edith had their hearts set upon the purchase of the Bush street hotel or apartment house. Whatever the son's influence may have been theretofore with his mother in matters of business or otherwise, it is very clear that upon this occasion and in this transaction it was not equal to the task of turning her from her fixed intention of disassociating herself from him in the business in which they were engaged if necessary to attain her purpose, and associating herself with the daughter in the ownership of the hotel property. Doubtless it was the judgment of herself and daughter that a rare opportunity had presented itself which should not be permitted to be lost. That she had greater faith in the hotel property as an investment than she had in the business of grape and fruit raising, there can be but little doubt. Had she heeded the son's advice she would not have disposed of her interest in the ranch to raise money to put into the hotel property, which investment, it seems, proved to have been an unfortunate exercise of judgment. The respondent did not initiate or encourage the purchase of the latter property, but, it would seem, did everything he reasonably could to prevent it. He was attempting to protect her from financial entanglements as well as himself.

[4] While there is a conflict in the evidence as between Mrs. Wilbur on the one hand and Glen Wilbur, Blaine McGowan, and Mr. Samuels on the other hand as to what took place or what was done or said by the respective parties during their negotiations in the law offices of Mr. McGowan and that which preceded said meeting, there is ample evidence to support the court's findings that Mrs. Wilbur was given her choice of purchasing the property for herself at the price of $25,000 or of selling it to her son at the same figure (which amount the court found to be a fair and adequate price), and that she was then and there in full possession of her faculties and had full knowledge of the values of the subject-matter of the conveyance and acted freely and voluntarily in said matter, and no false or fraudulent representations were made or force or coercion employed to induce or cause her to execute said deed.

[5] As against many circumstances and considerable direct evidence which tends to support the court's findings of free and voluntary action on the part of Mrs. Wilbur, her counsel lays stress upon a letter which her son wrote to her two days after said transaction, which it is claimed is self-accusatory in effect and carries with it a consciousness of having taken an unfair advantage of her. The letter in part reads:

"My Dearest, Dearest, Dearest Mother: I just feel dreadful to-night and have all day to-day for fear you might feel now or might after while feel that I was trying to take advantage of you or did take advantage.

"Mother dear, my heart would just break if you even thought that or felt that way for a single moment. My thoughts are always for your happiness, and I always have an aching heart when I come and see the way you work all the while. * * *"

The letter is an isolated circumstance in the transaction, and cannot be taken as sufficient to overturn many other circumstances and other evidence which tends to support the court's findings. Considering all the circumstances of the case and the relation of the parties to each other, the letter cannot be said to be open to but the single construction placed upon it by appellant. It does not in any way indicate an inadequate consideration, but expresses anxiety lest the mother should thereafter, as frequently happens in such matters, be led into the belief that she was not fairly dealt with. The mother, however, expressed no feelings of dissatisfaction at the price she had received for said property until a member of the family thereafter suggested to her that it was not an adequate consideration.

[6] One-half of the entire mortgage incumbrance which rested upon the whole property would reduce the value of Mrs. Wilbur's interest slightly below $25,000. The finding as to adequacy of price cannot, in view of the evidence and the finding of the court, be disturbed. The value of said property was not a subject suddenly thrust upon the mind of Mrs. Wilbur, the consideration of which she had had no previous opportunity or occasion to devote her thought upon. She had known it as a family property for a period of more than 50 years, was thoroughly familiar with its improvements and the productiveness and quality of soil, and had been one of its owners in connection with her son for a period of almost four years immediately prior to the day the deed was executed. Besides, she doubtless considered its market value at the time she was contemplating incumbering it to raise money to enable her to acquire the Bush street property. That she was not taken by surprise in the transaction is an inference fairly deducible from all the facts and transactions in the case. A number of disinterested witnesses, several of whom had resided in the immediate vicinity for many years, and who, beyond the possibility of doubt, knew the value of the land in controversy, placed Mrs. Wilbur's interest therein, including all personal property, at $31,000. Some of said witnesses had cultivated the soil and had assisted in setting it to vines and trees. If this testimony is to be believed, and the trial court certainly accepted it as true, $25,000 in the clear was a fair market value of the interest of Mrs. Wilbur.

If Mrs. Wilbur was acting freely and voluntarily and under no legal restraint or disability she had the right to make such disposition of her property and at such a figure as she thought the exigencies of her situation required. If the price was reasonably adequate to the value of the property and she was acting under no disabilities, but freely and voluntarily and knowingly, as the court found, the question of the accounting would become eliminated from the case. The price paid by Mrs. Wilbur for the property was $20,000, and she sold it for $25,000. The report of Accountant Cline, who made a detailed statement of accounts covering the entire period of copartnership, would indicate that Mrs. Wilbur had advanced to the partnership $4,812.90 and had withdrawn therefrom $4,488.20, leaving a balance to her credit on October 16, 1922, of $324.70. Under the management of Glen A. Wilbur, the mortgage of $18,000 was reduced to $12,000. Of this fact Mrs. Wilbur was well aware. A number of the items of the account as prepared by Accountant Cline were attacked as not being proper charges against the partnership, but as being individual charges against the son. A charge of $9,000 made by Glen as salary for services for a period of 45 months at $200 per month was opposed on the theory that "a partner is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered by him to the partnership," as provided by section 2413, Civil Code. There is some evidence to the effect that it was agreed between the parties that the son, who gave his entire time and attention to the cultivation, harvesting, curing and marketing of crops, while the mother was residing in San Francisco and had no representative to perform her part of said services, was to receive extra or additional compensation. An agreement for additional compensation would not have been unreasonable or unlikely under the circumstances of the case.

What relevancy the controversy as to the salary claim made by the son on account of his services, or the loss suffered by reason of the Rosenberg contract, or whether $1,000 of the $5,000 that was paid by the son on the purchase price came from sales of partnership produce or from his private funds, or what relevancy any other disputed item may have to the major question, to wit, whether or not the deed was subject to be canceled for the reasons alleged by appellant, is not apparent. The market value of the land and the fairness of the transaction were the major issues. The market value of the land and the abundances of crops which it yielded were not and could not have been affected by a misapplication of moneys derived from sales of produce, if such occurred.

[7, 8] The court having found that Mrs. Wilbur was not deceived as to the market value of said premises, but that she acted freely, voluntarily, and knowingly in the matter, renders all other issues made by the pleadings immaterial. Nevertheless the court found against appellant on the contested items of the account. It is the law of partnerships that when one partner purchases the interest of the other the transaction presumptively includes a final settlement of all partnership indebtedness existing between the partners. Bates on Partnerships, §§ 629, 630, pp. 664, 665; Hattenhauer v. Adamick, 70 Ill. App. 602; Edens v. Williams, 36 Ill. 252.

[9, 10] It is insistently urged as one of the claims of appellant that there existed an actual relationship of trust and confidence between Mrs. Wilbur and her son, and that he acted as her agent in all business matters connected with the partnership. It is further urged that she acted in the matter alone and without having had the benefit of independent advice. A number of cases are cited to sustain her position as to these several points. It is the well-settled rule of decision of this state that:

"The mere relation of parent and child is not sufficient to invalidate a deed from the former to the latter. It is a circumstance, of course, inviting careful consideration to the transaction, but before it can justify the inference of undue influence there must be added, imposition, fraud, importunity or something of that kind." Broaddus v. James, 13 Cal. App. 464, 472, 110 P. 158, 161.

"The mere fact that the conveyance is from parent to child does not change the rule nor render the deed presumptively invalid. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 962; Bowdoin College v. Merritt (C. C.) 75 F. 488. However, under certain circumstances, the burden is upon the grantee to show that a deed from his parent was obtained without fraud or undue influence. The doctrine is announced in Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 145, 31 P. 910, through Mr. Justice Paterson, as follows: 'Some of the cases hold that undue influence is not to be inferred from the relation of parent and child where the gift is from the parent to the child (Millican v. Millican, 24 Tex. 446); but when the parent is of great age, or is enfeebled by disease, and conveys his entire estate to one child, to the exclusion of other children dependent upon his bounty, the burden is unquestionably upon the donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily and with full knowledge of all the facts and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer.'

"In the case at bar it cannot be said that the grantor was of great age, although she was 64. [Here, she was 68.] She was, though, somewhat enfeebled by disease, and she conveyed all her property to an only child, to the exclusion, however, of a grandchild. But the evidence seems clear that her mental faculties were unclouded, and there is no question that she understood the effect of a transfer of her property. If we assume that under the peculiar circumstances of the transaction the burden was cast upon the grantee to show that the conveyance was made freely and voluntarily and with the intention to vest the title immediately and irrevocably in him, still we would not be justified in disturbing the judgment of the lower court, because there is sufficient evidence in behalf of respondent's contention to sustain that burden and support the corresponding finding." Becker v. Schwerdtle, 6 Cal. App. 462, 464, 92 P. 398.

Likewise in the instant case the court found upon substantial evidence that appellant acted with full knowledge and understanding and freely and voluntarily in the execution of said deed, and was in good physical and mental health, and whatever burden that the law may have cast upon the son by reason of a confidential relationship was fully met.

[11] Appellant relies upon Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 P. 289, and other cases following the rule applied to certain cases in which cancellations of deeds were directed to be made. All of the cases in which attempted transfers failed contain some ingredient showing undue influence, or menace or mental weakness or want of full understanding of all the facts and the effect of the transfer or inadequacy of consideration, or that some species of imposition was practiced. The evidence in this case shows, and the court found, that the deed was made freely, voluntarily, and with a full understanding of all the facts and the effect of the transfer. This being so, it was not necessary to show that the grantor acted upon independent advice. Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 P. 910. The facts of a case may so conclusively show that an actor acted advisedly as not to require direct proof of the fact.

In view of what we have already said it becomes unnecessary to discuss the effect of the alleged tender other than to say that there was considerable delay shown in making it, and its sufficiency as a tender is questionable.

Having disposed of the case upon its merits, it also becomes unnecessary to discuss the bar of the statute and the effect of the judgment of dismissal, both of which were specially pleaded by defendant as heretofore stated.

[12] There is no merit in the objection to the promissory note made upon the ground that it was unsecured. It met with Mrs. Wilbur's approval, and no intimation has been made that it was not of the value written upon its face or that its maker was not solvent. In fact, the evidence shows that the note was pledged by her in some undisclosed transaction.

The finding that the McKenzie transaction was a separate affair of the defendant is supported by the evidence.

The record contains much conflicting evidence, and, following the rule of decision, we have only referred to the portions thereof which have a tendency to support the findings. We are not at liberty to pass judgment upon the credibility of witnesses. The judgment is affirmed.

HINDES et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 5227.)

1. Master and servant ⊂⊃419 — Supplemental award may not be used for correcting error.

Supplemental award by Industrial Accident Commission may not be used for correcting error in original award.

2. Master and servant ⊂⊃419 — Supplemental award for disability held not precluded by prior award.

Finding of Industrial Accident Commission that employé had sustained strain of sacroiliac joint, but that paralysis of legs, occurring about two weeks after injury, was caused by some obscure spinal trouble, rather than the injury, which finding became final by lapse of time, held not to preclude supplemental award, on petition under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20 (d), based on finding that sacroiliac strain had resulted in further and recurrent disability, independently of paralysis.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Emil Nasta, claimant, against S. G. Hindes and the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Company. On application of S. G. Hindes and the General Accident, Fire & Life Assurance Company for certiorari to review the order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation. Award affirmed.

R. P. Wisecarver and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury and Geo. C. Faulkner, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Certiorari by which petitioners seek to have set aside and annulled an award of the Industrial Accident Commission, upon the ground that the commission, in entering the same, acted without and in excess of its powers, that the findings and award are unreasonable, that the evidence does not sustain the findings of fact, and that such findings do not support the award.

It is admitted that petitioners' statement of the facts are in all material essentials correct. It appears therefrom, in substance, that by an application dated July 10, 1922, the respondent Emil Nasta applied for a hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission upon a claim wherein he asserted that on the 5th day of May, 1922, he was injured in a task arising out of and in the course of his employment for petitioner S. C. Hindes. Thereafter hearings were regularly had before the commission, from which the following facts appeared: That on or about May 5, 1922, Nasta, while working for Hindes, sustained a strain of the sacroiliac joint in the sacrum; that he was under the care of doctors for a period of 16 days; that he awoke one morning and found his lower limbs paralyzed. Nasta had previously, in 1920, suffered from an illness extending from the lumbar region of the spine to the lower extremities, which caused him pain and numbness with consequent disability for a period of 6 months. X-rays taken at that time showed a vertebral anomaly in the nature of a wedge-shaped vertebra. Subsequently Nasta had recovered the function of his legs, and had been working up to the time of the strain of the sacroiliac joint on May 5, 1922. The medical evidence upon the original hearing herein, relating to the paralysis suffered by Nasta, was conflicting. There was, however, evidence to show that it was in no wise connected with nor caused by the strain of the sacroiliac joint on May 5, 1922; that it was of spinal cord origin, caused by disease affecting that member, the exact nature of which could not be determined without an operation exposing the same, but it probably was related to and caused by the same disease originating in the illness of 1920.

In accordance with this medical evidence the Industrial Accident Commission made and filed its findings of fact and award under date of October 16, 1922, wherein it was held that the disability caused by the strain of May 5, 1922, was a temporary one only, and entitled the applicant to compensation for 4 weeks of disability, amounting to 3 weeks of indemnity at $20.83 a week, a total of $62.49. This temporary disability ended on June 2, 1922. The commission further found that about 2 weeks after the injury, the employee developed a paralysis of the legs, caused by some obscure spinal trouble. It also found that such spinal disease was not caused by the injury, and no compensation was allowed for the paralysis, but only for the period the employee was presumably disabled as a result of the back strain directly.

Within 20 days after this conclusion by the commission, Nasta filed a petition for rehearing. On December 18, 1922, his petition was granted. Thereafter, upon proceedings regularly had, further medical testimony was taken upon the question of paralysis. There was a sharp conflict in this evidence. Some of the experts were of the opinion that the suffered strain could have caused a hemorrhage into the spinal cord, which would account for the paralysis. Others were of a contrary opinion, as they testified that the condition of Nasta showed that his ailment was strictly of systemic origin, not arising from injury.

With this evidence before it, the commission subsequently and on the 26th day of February, 1924, made and filed its findings of fact and decision. It found, as upon the first hearing, that the applicant had sustained an injury in the course of and arising out of his employment, consisting of a strain of the right sacroiliac joint; that about two weeks after this injury he developed paralysis of the legs, caused by some obscure spinal trouble. The commission accordingly determined that such spinal disease and the paralysis of the legs was not caused by the injury, and that no compensation was due for such paralysis, but only for the period the employee would presumably have been disabled as a result of the back and sacroiliac strain, which was fixed at 3 months from the date of the injury. An award was accordingly made for the sum of $252.94, to cover this period of temporary disability due to the strain. This amount was paid to the applicant by the defendant insurance carrier.

No petition for a rehearing was made to this decision within the 20 days prescribed by the Workmen's Compensation Act, nor was any petition for writ of review made to an appellate court therefrom within 30 days, and the decision became final March 28, 1924. Seven months thereafter, on the 31st day of October, 1924, Nasta filed with the commission a petition for reopening of his case under St. 1917, p. 850, § 20 (d), wherein it was set forth that the injury suffered by him had become permanent and should be treated as a "permanent disability." Defendants appeared and contested the jurisdiction of the commission, setting forth that no appeal or other proceedings had been initiated by the applicant within the time allowed by law, and that the matter had therefore become res judicata; that, the condition from which the applicant suffered having been held to be noncompensable, it was immaterial whether it was "permanent" or "temporary" in character, and that the decision was final.

Thereafter hearings were held before the commission upon the application where it appeared, according to evidence produced by the applicant, that about January, 1924, Nasta had burned his left foot, and that he had been confined to his home by reason thereof until the latter part of May, 1924; that, although still totally disabled from work, due to his paralysis, he became ambulatory about the latter period, and visited the office of the commission, at which time he discussed the case with its medical director; that by reason of this use of his leg he broke a blister on his left foot, and was again confined to his home until approximately September 7, 1924, when he began to get around; that previously, by the use of a foot brace stabilizing his lower extremities, he had been able to shuffle about, notwithstanding his paralysis; that the brace which he used to correct his right "foot drop" had worn out, and that he had discarded it; that on or about September 15, 1924, he visited the University of California Hospital Clinic to consult doctors as to what might be done for the pain and weakness of his right leg, and while going down a stairway, using a cane to aid him in his progress, he fell and strained and wrenched his right side. The applicant further testified that he had been troubled with this pain and weakness in his back and leg ever since the original accident, and that, while his condition was improved and he was getting better while he had remained in bed, when he had commenced to walk around and visit the clinic the pain and weakness again returned, and at the time of his fall he had not slipped, but his leg had buckled up or given way under him.

After this hearing, and on February 3, 1925, the commission made and filed a supplemental award, wherein it found that the original injury and the sacroiliac strain resulting therefrom had resulted in further and recurrent disability independently of the paralysis, and allowed compensation in the sum of $20.83 a week, beginning September 15, 1924, and continuing indefinitely thereafter, until the termination of said disability or the further order of the commission. Within 20 days thereafter defendants petitioned for a rehearing upon the same grounds as are here urged. They claimed that the applicant's condition is one of progressive paralysis; that the injury due to the fall was not, therefore, an industrial injury, but was a new and separate one, in no wise compensable, and for which, in any event, the employer and his insurance carrier could not be held liable; that the commission was without power to rate the condition as a permanent one for the paralysis, nor was it empowered to give compensation for any temporary disability due either to the paralysis or the fall; that the fall was due to the weakened condition of the right leg, which was caused by paralysis, which the commission had previously held to be noncompensable; that the commission had therefore no authority to reopen the case, as the evidence shows that there is no new development of the compensable injury present, but only a progression of the paralytic symptoms caused by the spinal cord disease. The application was denied.

[1] There is no question but that the original award, wherein the commission found the paralysis from which the applicant is suffering to be noncompensable, has become final, and that the commission therefore was without authority to reconsider the case, or make an award based upon this ailment. Georgia Casualty Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 177 Cal. 289, 170 P. 625; McBride v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 182 Cal. 407, 187 P. 1050. Supplemental awards may not be used for the purpose of correcting error in the original award. Grand Union Hotel v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. App.) 226 P. 948.

[2] The jurisdiction of the commission to mke an award due to the applicant's paralysis was exhausted. But it must be remembered that there were two conditions involved in petitioner's case upon the original hearing, viz. the original injury and the sacroiliac strain resulting therefrom and the paralysis immediately following. The commission has only determined by the supplemental award that the sacroiliac strain has resulted in further and recurrent disability independently of the paralysis.

As to this injury the commission retained a continuing jurisdiction to alter or amend its award under section 20(d) of the act. The evidence as above narrated shows that new facts have arisen since the making of the award, which relate to this particular injury. It shows that the applicant suffered from a fall, and in our opinion it justifies the inference that the fall and consequent injury was due to the weakness resulting from the sacroiliac strain, and is sufficient to support the award.

This being so, the finding of the commission is just as conclusive upon this question as was its former finding, upon conflicting evidence, that the paralysis which followed so closely upon the original injury was not due to the injury, and therefore noncompensable.

The award is affirmed.

MURPHY et al. v. LUTHY BATTERY CO. et al. (Civ. 4975.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 29, 1925.)

1. Assignments ⟸18—Guaranty of lease held assignable chose in action, and guarantors not exonerated by assignment of original lessor.

Where guaranty of lease was not limited by its terms to original lessor, it was an assignable chose in action, and guarantors were not exonerated from liability by virtue of the assignment by one of original lessors to one of parties plaintiff.

2. Assignments ⟸18—Whether a contract is assignable may be question of intent of party to be determined by terms of contract.

Whether a contract is assignable may be question of intent of party to be determined by terms of contract.

3. Assignments ⟸19—When a contract is not assignable stated.

A contract is not held assignable, where the parties expressly stipulate to the contrary, where its language excludes the idea of performance by another, where it is entered into because of special knowledge, skill, or ability of party, or in reliance upon his credit and solvency, and where performance by another would be different from that contracted for.

4. Assignments ⟸18—Right to receive money due under contract assignable without consent of other party.

Personal confidence is not ordinarily involved in right to receive money due or to become due under contract, and the right is generally assignable without consent of other party.

5. Guaranty ⟸36(9)—Guarantors, held liable under lease, chargeable with attorney's fees for enforcement of its terms.

Where guarantors were held liable for the rental due under lease, they were also chargeable with attorney's fees for the enforcement of its terms.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by John Murphy and another against the Luthy Battery Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Edward F. Treadwell and R. S. Laughlin, both of San Francisco, for appellant Taylor.

Charles S. Wheeler and Charles S. Wheeler, Jr., both of San Francisco, for appellants Miller and Denny.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. An appeal by defendants Denny, Miller, and Taylor from a judgment awarded to plaintiffs for unpaid rental of real property. The appellants were sued and held liable as guarantors of a lease under which said rental accrued. Their sole contention is that they were released from the obligation of guaranty when one of the original lessors assigned his interest in said lease and guaranty to one of the plaintiffs herein.

The facts are not disputed and are substantially as follows: On March 11, 1920, Morris G. Jonas and John Murphy leased certain premises in San Francisco to Joseph P. Schiller for a term of five years at a stipulated total rental of $19,920, payable in monthly installments of $332; four installments thereof being paid in advance, on the execution of the lease. With permission of the lessors said lease was thereafter assigned by Schiller to defendant Luthy Battery Company, a corporation. The lease provided, among other things, that it should bind the heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns of any and all of the parties thereto, and provision was also made therein for the payment of a reasonable attorney's fee in the event action was brought to enforce its terms. Contemporaneously with the execution of said lease, as part of the same transaction, and on the same document, appellants guaranteed the performance of the covenants of said lease on the part of the lessees in a guaranty reading as follows:

"In consideration of the foregoing lease or agreement, and one dollar ($1.00) to us paid, we do hereby covenant, promise and agree to and with the said Morris G. Jonas and John Murphy that the said Joseph P. Schiller or his assigns shall well and truly pay all rents and perform and execute all the covenants therein contained on his part, or on the part of his assigns, and that on his failure, or the failure of his assigns, to do so in any particular, we will forthwith pay in United States gold coin unto the said Morris G. Jonas and John Murphy all rents or damages that may happen by reason of such failure, not exceeding the sum of eighteen thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars ($18,592).

"Dated and signed this 11th day of March, 1920. Joseph P. Schiller.
"Omer Denny.
"Carlton Earle Miller.
"Wm. M. Taylor."

On May 21, 1923, Jonas assigned to Emile E. Kahn, one of the plaintiffs and respondents herein, all of his right, title, and interest in said lease and guaranty. After the execution of said assignment the corporate defendant, Luthy Battery Company, failed to pay the rent, and this action was brought by John Murphy, one of the original lessors, and Emile E. Kahn, assignee of Jonas, against said Luthy Battery Company and the guarantors, to recover the rental due on May 23, 1923, part of which accrued prior and part subsequent to said assignment from Jonas to Kahn. Defendants Schiller and Luthy Battery Company defaulted, but these appellants appeared and defended the action upon the ground that said guaranty did not extend to the benefit of the assigns of the original promisees, and that the assignment of said lease and guaranty from Jonas to Kahn, on May 21, 1923, operated as a release and exoneration of them from any liability accruing subsequent to the date of said assignment. They also denied liability for the arrearages accruing prior to said assignment. The trial court held that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the rental accruing prior to the assignment from Jonas to Kahn, but held appellants liable for the amount falling due subsequent to said assignment. Judgment for plaintiffs and against appellants was entered accordingly for the sum of $332, which amount represented the installment of rental falling due after the assignment, and for the further sum of $75, attorneys' fees and costs. The basis for the trial court's ruling against appellants was that the guaranty in question, not being limited by its terms to Jonas and Murphy, the original lessors, was not a special guaranty, but was an assignable chose in action, and that, therefore, appellants were not exonerated from liability by virtue of said assignment from Jonas to Kahn.

[1] We are of the opinion that the conclusions reached by the trial court are sustained by the case of Reios v. Mardis, 18 Cal. App. 277, 122 P. 1091, and that the case mentioned is decisive of the contentions urged by appellants on this appeal. There the guaranty, like the one in the instant case, was executed contemporaneously with the lease, was made a part thereof, and the express consideration therefor was the execution of the lease. The guarantor there agreed that the lessee would pay the rent and perform the conditions thereof, or upon default the guarantor would hold the lessor harmless to the extent of a certain amount therein specified. Subsequently, the lease and guaranty were assigned, and, upon default in payment of rent, suit to collect the same was commenced by the assignees. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend, and judgment was given for the defendant. Plaintiffs appealed. It was contended by the respondent there, as the appellants are contending here, that the contract of guaranty could not be enforced except by the party to whom it was given; that the guaranty was addressed to the lessor named in the lease without a provision permitting its assignment and therefore was personal to him, and could not be assigned so as to give the assignees a right of action therein. These contentions were held to be without merit, the court saying:

"This contention is based upon the common-law rule which prohibited an assignee from suing in his own name upon a chose in action, or any promise or other liability other than negotiable paper, originally running to his assignors. 2 Blackstone, 467, 468; 2 Chitty on Contracts, p. 1357; Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 1.

"The common-law rule that a chose in action was not negotiable in the sense that it was transferable so as to enable the assignee to maintain an action thereon has been materially modified, if not entirely superseded, by statute in this state, save, therefore, as a matter of history, the numerous cases cited by respondents from other jurisdictions, where, in the absence of statutory regulation, the rule of the common law prevails, have little, if any bearing upon the question presented here, and, in so far as they are in conflict with the statutory rule in force in this state, must be disregarded.

"The right to recover money by a judicial proceeding is defined to be a thing in action, which, if it arises out of an obligation, may be transferred by the owner without prejudice to any set-offs or other defense existing at the time of or before notice of assignment; and a written contract for the payment of money, even though it be nonnegotiable in form, may be transferred with all the rights of the assignor in like manner with negotiable instruments, subject, however, to all the equities and defenses existing in favor of the maker of the contract at the time of the transfer. Civ. Code, §§ 953, 954, 1458, 1459; Code Civ. Proc. § 368.

"In this state 'every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest' (Code Civ. Proc. § 367); and whatever the common-law rule, or the reason for its origin, may have been, it is certain that the immediate effect of the several Code sections just cited is to permit the assignee of a contract of guaranty, which is but a chose in action, to sue thereon in his own name (La Rue v. Groe-zinger, 84 Cal. 281, 24 P. 42, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179; Rued v. Cooper, 109 Cal. 682, 34 P. 98; Simmons v. Zimmerman, 144 Cal. 256, 79 P. 451, 1 Ann. Cas. 850; Weir v. Anthony, 35 Neb. 396, 53 N. W. 206; Small v. Sloan, 14 N. Y. Super. Ct. 352; Wood v. Farmer, 200 Mass. 209, 86 N. E. 297; First Nat. Bank v. Carpenter, 41 Iowa, 518; Cunningham v. Norton, 5 Cal. Unrep. 35, 40 P. 491).

"If the contract of guaranty in the case at bar had been specifically limited to the lessor named in the lease, there would have been much force in the contention that the obligation of the guarantor was purely personal, and that its assignment, before default of the lessee, operated as a discharge of the obligation. Here, however, there was no limitation of the guaranty, either expressly or impliedly, to the lessor personally, and, like any other promise made to him, it could be assigned and sued on by the assignee. 20 Cyc. 1431, 1483; Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473, 17 N. E. 379."

The same general doctrine as to assignability of choses in action is set forth as being the law of this state in California Jurisprudence (3 Cal. Jur. p. 236), and in Union Collection Co. v. Oliver, 23 Cal. App. 318, 137 P. 1082, wherein the defendant Oliver addressed to plaintiff's assignor an instrument of guaranty in the following form:

"San Francisco, Cal., July 3, 1902.

"Mr. H. J. Miller, City—Dear Sir: I hereby guarantee to refund all moneys paid by you for the purchase of Zubiate stock in twelve months from date, in the event that you are not satisfied with your investment.

"[Signed] Dew. R. Oliver, President."

The court said upon this particular subject:

"Nor is there any merit in the argument of defendant that the contract was personal, and therefore unassignable. The contract does not provide that it shall not be assigned. Neither is it in its nature strictly personal, and therefore unassignable. 2 Am. & Eng. Ency. pp. 1010, 1018; 4 Cyc. 22; Taylor v. Black Diamond, 86 Cal. 589, 25 P. 51."

In Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473, 17 N. E. 379, cited approvingly in Reios v. Mardis, supra, the rule is clearly stated that—

"In order thus to limit a guaranty, the language should be plain and peculiar, and the intention of the parties should not be left in uncertainty."

In that case, like here, there was no limitation of the guaranty to the promisee personally. The court in that case further held that—

"Even if the guaranty should be construed as a guaranty of payment to Nelson F. Stillman [the original promisee], it would yet be a guaranty which he could assign with the mortgage. Like any other promise made to him, it could be assigned and could be enforced by any party to whom it was assigned."

To the same effect is the case of Lindenberg Corporation v. Howland, 115 Misc. Rep. 244, 187 N. Y. S. 917, in which it was claimed that a guaranty annexed to the lease, running to the lessor and his "legal representatives," did not include the assigns of the lessor. The court there said:

"There is no provision in the lease that the landlord cannot assign it, and providing, as it does, that it shall inure to the benefit of the successor in interest of the landlord, which must be read in connection with the guaranty, which refers to the lease, it is a fair and necessary inference that the defendant understood that impliedly, if not expressly, the landlord had a right to and might assign the lease, and that his rights thereunder would pass to his assignee, his successor in interest."

It will be observed that in the case before us the guarantors guaranteed the payment of the entire rental for the full five-year period of the lease, to wit, the sum of $18,592, from which fact it may be fairly inferred, as the trial court held, that it was intended that the guaranty should inure to the benefit of the assignees of the original lessors, in the event that lease was assigned at any time during the life thereof.

[2-4] Whether or not a given contract is assignable may be a question of the intention of the parties to be determined by construction of the terms of the contract. Montgomery v. De Picot, 153 Cal. 509, 96 P. 305, 126 Am. St. Rep. 84. Thus a contract is not to be held assignable where the parties expressly stipulate to the contrary, or where its language excludes the idea of performance by another, or where it was entered into because of special knowledge, skill, or ability of the party (La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 281, 24 P. 42, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179), or in reliance upon his credit and solvency, and where a performance by another would be an essentially different thing from that contracted for (Montgomery v. De Picot, supra; 3 Cal. Jur. p. 239). But none of those exceptions are present here, nor does the guaranty in question embrace any relationship of trust and confidence between the guarantors and the original lessors. The obligation guaranteed was one merely relating to the receipt of money. Personal confidence is not ordinarily involved in a right to receive money due or to become due under a contract, and the right is generally assignable without the consent of the other party. In re Wright, 157 F. 544, 85 C. C. A. 206, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 193. In this connection may be cited the case of Levy v. Cohen, 103 App. Div. 195, 92 N. Y. S. 1074, in which the guarantors guaranteed to a contractor payments to be made on a building contract, and which contract was afterwards assigned to plaintiff. In holding that the guaranty was assignable, the court said:

"The original contract being assignable, and there being no trust or confidence reposed in Margovitz [the original promisee], the guaranty must be regarded as a general one, and passes with the principal obligation, for it is entirely immaterial to whom the money was paid, so long as the contract was performed. Everson v. Gere, 122 N. Y. 290, 25 N. E. 492. Notwithstanding its being a guaranty to pay Margovitz, it is one which he could assign with the principal contract, as was held in Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 480, 481, 17 N. E. 379."

Appellants endeavor to differentiate the case of Reios v. Mardis, supra, from the case at bar upon two particular grounds: First, that it appears from the decision therein that the guarantors consented to the assignment of the lease and guaranty; and, secondly, that, by the terms of the guaranty there, the agreement was to indemnify the "lessor" against loss, while here the agreement was "to pay to said Morris G. Jonas and John Murphy all rents and damages that may happen" by reason of the failure of the lessee and his assigns to pay the rent and perform and execute the covenants of said lease. We believe that neither of those distinctions renders that case ineffectual as a controlling authority. While it is true the guarantor there did consent to the assignment, its liability as such was not declared by the court upon the theory of either consent or ratification, but was placed upon the broader ground of the right of the promisee to make the assignment. In reference to the second proposition, the case of Levy v. Cohen, supra, seems directly applicable, wherein it holds that where the contract is assignable, and there is no trust or confidence reposed in the original promisee, the guaranty must be regarded as a general one and passes with the original obligation, for it is entirely immaterial to whom the money is paid, so long as the contract is performed.

The case of Garfield v. Ford, 191 Cal. 69, 214 P. 963, cited, and more or less relied upon by appellants, is readily distinguishable, we think, from the instant case on account of the facts. There the guarantor promised that an intending buyer would pay for goods which should be purchased from the promisee. But no contract of purchase was ever made with, nor were any goods ever delivered by, said promisee. The sale of the goods was actually made by a different individual, and consequently no question of assignability of guaranty arose or was considered. In other words, the guaranty was a mere offer to pay a prospective debt, if the promisee therein named extended the credit (Herron v. Flack, 46 Cal. App. 374, 189 P. 294), which offer did not become operative until acted upon by the promisee, and the promisee having never acted upon the same, the guaranty did not become effective, and consequently was not transferable (28 Cor. Jur. 943), and could not be converted in a security for the benefit of a stranger.

Appellants also cite and emphasize the case of Murphy v. Ottmann, 127 App. Div. 563, 111 N. Y. S. 912. There the guarantors agreed to indemnify the lessors against default on the part of one Hammond, the lessee. The lessors sought to hold the guarantors liable for the default of the assigns of Hammond. It is at once apparent that this could not be done because as between Hammond and the guarantors there existed a relationship of trust and confidence that did not extend to any other person without the consent of the guarantors. The case of Bank v. Webster, 70 Okl. 73, 172 P. 942, L. R. A. 1918F, 696, is not in point for the same reason. The case of Skinkle v. American National Bank of San Francisco, 36 Cal. App. 225, 171 P. 967, dealt with a rule of construction; it being held, in that respect, that, where there was a contradiction of terms between the main obligation and the guaranty, the terms of the guaranty governed. That situation did not arise here. The case of Johnson v. Quinby, 62 Cal. App. 137, 216 P. 397, is not pertinent to the issues of this case, and the other cases cited by appellant are distinguishable because of their facts or else they follow the common-rule against assignability, which, as already shown by the case of Reios v. Mardis, supra, does not prevail in this state.

[5] The guarantors being liable for the rental due under the lease, they were also chargeable with attorneys' fees for the enforcement of its terms. Grace v. Croninger, 56 Cal. App. 659, 206 P. 130; Henne v. Summers, 23 Cal. App. 763, 139 P. 907.

The judgment is affirmed.

FIKE v. SAN JOAQUIN LIGHT & POWER CORPORATION. (Civ. 5097.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 21, 1925.)

1. Negligence ⟸136(26)—Contributory negligence question for jury.

Question of contributory negligence, like that of negligence, is a question for the jury, and only when facts are clear and undisputed, and no other inference than that of negligence can be drawn from the facts, is court authorized in withdrawing such question from jury.

2. Electricity ⟸19(5)—Recovery for death sustained by evidence.

In action for death caused by negligently maintaining high voltage wires in exposed and unguarded condition, held, that the evidence supported verdict of the jury for plaintiff.

3. Electricity ⟸19(6)—Whether warning signs were sufficient held question for jury.

In an action for death caused by unguarded high voltage wires of defendant, it was a question of fact for the jury whether warning signs posted on the posts 10 feet from the wires was sufficient warning, and it was therefore proper for the court to submit the question of negligence to the jury.

4. Electricity ⟸15(1)—Contention workman was trespasser or licensee held without merit.

In an action for death caused by unguarded high-voltage wire on top of building of employer of deceased, defendant electric company's contention that deceased was mere trespasser or licensee held without merit, in view of evidence that deceased was carrying out orders of superior for his employer.

5. Trial ⟸296(8)—Erroneous instruction on preponderance of evidence held harmless in view of other instructions.

In an action for wrongful death, erroneous instructions by the court upon preponderance of the evidence held harmless, in view of other instructions which fully and correctly stated the law.

6. Electricity ⟸19(4)—Evidence as to instructions to employees held irrelevant.

In an action for wrongful death caused by unguarded high-voltage wires, rejection of evidence of employer's manager as to giving of instructions to employees relative to electric wires on top of employer's building properly rejected as irrelevant, inasmuch as it was immaterial what instructions other employees had received if it were not shown that deceased had received them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by Marion Fike, as administratrix of the estate of R. S. Fike, deceased, against the San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Conley, W. M. Conley, and Philip Conley, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts, Ewing, Wild & Everts and Dan F. Conway, all of Fresno, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the defendant, San Joaquin Light & Power Corporation, from a judgment entered against it upon a verdict of a jury in the sum of $26,000.

Plaintiff brought this action as administratrix of the estate of her deceased husband, R. S. Fike, charging that his death was due to the negligence of the defendant corporation. The facts necessary for a correct understanding of the questions involved on this appeal, and which are practically uncontroverted may be thus briefly stated:

It was stipulated at the trial that deceased died from an electric shock, which he received on the roof of the Valley Ice Company's building on the 22d day of March, 1919. The Valley Ice Company, a corporation owned and operated a plant for the manufacture of ice, located about one mile southeast of the city of Fresno. The ice company's plant was divided into two cement one-story buildings, of the same height, one of which we shall refer to as the "old building," and the second as the "new building." The new building had recently been built to the west of the old building. In the operation of its plant the ice company used certain electrical power, furnished by the defendant corporation. This power was furnished by defendant at points inside of said Valley Ice Company's plant. Prior to the erection of the new building the high-voltage wires of defendant had entered the old building at the top of two poles which stood on the west side of the old building. In order to facilitate the construction of the new building, the wires were changed so that they ran to the top of the old building from two poles situated about 5 or 6 feet from the northwest corner of the old building. Three electric wires, from 30 to 36 inches apart, ran from these last-named poles to the insulators near the northwest corner of the roof of the old building, and through these insulators through the roof to the transformers under the roof, and then to the machinery below. These insulators extended approximately 34 inches above the top of the roof, and were about 10 inches in diameter. The wires entered the insulators on the roof of the old building approximately 18 inches east of the west side of the old building, and near where the roofs of the old and new buildings met, and about 18 inches west of the insulators and wire, and on the roof of the old building, was a small cement coping about 7 inches in height on the north end, and tapering toward the south, along the west side of the old building, to the level of the roof. On the east and south of these insulators and wires was a seven-foot galvanized screen, which ran from the north edge of the old building to the south edge, and thence west to the southwest corner of the old building. On the south side of these insulators, wires, and screen was the north wall of another building belonging to the ice company, known as the "condenser house." On the north side of these wires and insulators was the north side of the old building, and there was no screen or barrier on that side, but no access could be gained to the roof on this side except by scaling the wall or by means of a ladder, etc. There was no screen or barrier of any kind on the west side of the wires next to the roof of the new building; in fact, this side of defendant's electrical equipment was entirely exposed, and there was nothing to prevent a person who might be on the roof of the new building from walking directly into these live wires, which carried a current of 60,000 volts. On each of the poles, near the ground, on the north side of the old building, were cloth-warning signs with the word "Danger" written thereon, and there was another similar sign on each pole about 4 or 5 feet above the level of the top of the old building, and about 10 feet from where the wires went through the insulators in the roof.

There were two means of access to the roofs of the buildings; one through the condenser room in the old building, directly south of the live wires, and the other by means of a movable ladder reaching to the roof of the new building, which ladder was located on the north side of the new building near the west end thereof.

For some time prior to March 22, 1919, the date of the injury to the deceased, the defendant had been engaged in altering the electrical equipment upon said roof; in fact, a new substation was being constructed upon the west end of the roof of the new building, preparatory to moving the high-voltage wires and equipment from the old building to the new location so as to enlarge the plant. The defendant had, in the course of this work, bored several holes in and through the roof of the new building in order to anchor its electrical wires and equipment, etc. Three of these holes came through the roof into the room immediately underneath.

It will be borne in mind that the defendant corporation not only owned all of the electrical equipment on the roof of the Valley Ice Company's plant on the date of the injury to deceased, but, under an agreement with the Valley Ice Company, had agreed to maintain and control all said electrical equipment. On the day of the injury, a Mr. Nichols, the foreman in charge of the alterations and installations of the electrical equipment for defendant corporation, requested Mr. Whitney, who was chief engineer of the ice company's plant, to patch up the holes which had been drilled in the roof by defendant, and this Mr. Whitney agreed to do. On this point Mr. Whitney testified as follows:

"Q. You may state to the jury what, if anything, Mr. Nichols said to you regarding the patching up of the holes on the roof. A. Mr. Nichols came to me and said he was about through the job, and where they had drilled the holes through the roof it needed patching up, but, as we had cement there and had a man who understood the handling of cement, he asked me if I wouldn't have it done—a short job—as an accommodation to him, and I said, 'Yes; we will;' and that was all I said to him concerning that."

These holes referred to by Mr. Nichols were in the roof of the new building, about 30 feet from the dangerous wires, and there was no obstruction, as we have seen, between these holes and the live wires. Mr. Nichols did not inform Mr. Whitney as to the exact location of the holes on the roof. The new equipment or substation on the roof of the new building was not in operation, and the current was still passing through the wires on the roof of the old building on the date of the accident.

R. S. Fike, the deceased, was 48 years of age, a common laborer, and was a married man with a wife and 8 children, and employed by the Valley Ice Company as a common laborer, and unaccustomed to electricity or electrical apparatus of any kind, and had only been employed by the ice company 4 or 5 days. On the said 22d day of March, 1919, the date he received the injury from which he died the following day, he was doing odd jobs for the Valley Ice Company around its plant on the ground floor. His immediate foreman was a Mr. Stanford. At about 11 o'clock a. m. on the morning of the accident he was engaged in cleaning a large wheel in the engine or condenser room on the first floor of the new part of the ice plant. When Mr. Nichols requested Mr. Whitney to have the holes filled, Mr. Whitney turned to the foreman, Mr. Stanford, and told him to take a man and go up and fill the holes. Mr. Stanford at that time asked Mr. Whitney what man he should take, and during this conversation Mr. Fike passed along through the engine or transformer room, where these men were talking, and Mr. Whitney replied: "Take this man here," referring to Mr. Fike. Whether Mr Fike heard the conversation between Stanford and Whitney the evidence does not reveal.

Just what followed this conversation up to the time of the accident can best be shown by the testimony of Mr. Stanford, Mr. Fike's foreman, which is as follows:

"Q. Did you know a man named R. S. Fike there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Do you know what he was doing in the forenoon of March 22d? A. He was painting the flywheel in the engine room.

"Q. Do you know what time in the forenoon he finished painting the flywheel in the engine room? A. Somewhere around 11 o'clock.

"Q. And did you have any conversation with him after that? A. Yes, I told him to come; that Mr. Whitney came to me and told me to do a job, and I told him to come with me and patch up some roofs.

"Q. What did Fike do immediately after that, if anything? A. Why, he came with me and asked me, he said, 'I have done that job;' and we went into the transformer room and started patching up.

"Q. You went in the transformer room and started patching up? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What part did you patch up in the transformer room? A. The roof.

"Q. The inside of the roof? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Still you were downstairs? A. Yes, sir; down on the ground floor.

"Q. In the transformer room? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did you patch up in there? A. The two holes over the switchboard.

"Q. And what did Fike patch up? A. He patched up the one in the alleyway, between the pump room and transformer room—there is an alleyway through there and he patched up the roof there.

"Q. Was there a hole down in the corner on the inside; who patched that up? A. I patched that up in the engine room—I mean in the transformer room.

"Q. In that far corner of the transformer room? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. This is the transformer room? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And the hole you patched up was in this corner? A. Yes, sir; that one and the other one.

"Q. And where were the others? A. One here, and one there.

"Q. After Fike and you got through patching the holes on the inside of the rooms, what time of day was it then, about? A. It was after lunch when he finished that hole.

"Q. What, if anything, did you say to Fike then? A. I said, 'We will go up on the roof and finish up there; put some tar, asphaltum, in the holes.'

"Q. Where did you go then? A. I told him to go and get the tar pot; I says, 'You go one way, and I will go the other.'

"Q. The tar bucket? A. The tar bucket; he met me in the blacksmith shop with the tar bucket.

"Q. And you went to the blacksmith shop? A. He met me at the blacksmith shop.

"Q. When you told him about going up on the roof to patch these holes, where were you standing? A. Inside of the alleyway, between the transformer room and the pump room.

"Q. When you went to look for the tar bucket, which way did you go? A. I think I went to the left and he came to the right.

"Q. And he met you where? A. At the blacksmith shop.

"Q. What were you doing there? A. I met him there, and I took the tar bucket to put it on the forge to melt the asphaltum.

"Q. Was there asphaltum in the tar bucket? A. Yes; what we call tar, asphaltum.

"Q. And did Fike stay there while you melted the tar or asphaltum? A. No; he said to me, 'There isn't sufficient in there;' and I said, 'Yes, there is plenty in there, you will see;' and with that he left me.

"Q. What direction did he go? A. He went around straight ahead, and then to the left where we had been working.

"Q. Towards the place where you had been working? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And did you, after that, hear any report? A. I heard a report, sir.

"Q. What kind of a report? A. Oh, a kind of report and flash.

"Q. Now, from the time that Mr. Fike left you in the forge room, where you had the tar melting it, from that time until the time you heard the flash, about how long was that—about what length of time intervened? A. Why, from 2 to 3 minutes.

"Q. From 2 to 3 minutes? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what did you do after you heard the flash? A. Why, I run around there to see what was the matter, and somebody was picking him up in a tarpaulin. I didn't see him laying down, but seen him in the tarpaulin.

"Q. Did you see him when he was up on top of the roof? A. I saw him in the tarpaulin.

"Q. What is it? A. I saw him in the tarpaulin; I didn't see him laying down on the roof.

"Q. On, in a tarpaulin? A. Yes, or canvas. I saw him up there but he was in the canvas.

"Q. You never told him to go up on the roof, did you? A. I didn't tell him to go up, nor I didn't tell him to stay down.

"Q. Did you say anything to him at all about any high-powered wires on the roof? A. No, sir.

"Q. He was working under your orders? A. Yes, sir. * * *

"Q. Do you know whether Fike knew anything about the danger of those high-power wires? A. I don't think he did.

"Q. And didn't you and Fike have a little talk about the danger of those wires? A. I told him not to touch any wires down there because they was hot, and he said, 'Don't be afraid; I am scared of it.'

"Q. Do you know whether he knew it was electricity that was coming through them? A. I don't know anything about what he knew, but I told him the wires was hot in the transformer room, but I didn't tell him anything about the roof."

It is the theory of respondent, which was evidently accepted by the jury, that deceased ascended the roof of the new building by means of the same ladder used by the employees of appellant, located near the west end of the new building, and was looking over the entire roof of the new building for holes to be filled, when he came in contact with appellant's high-voltage wire or wires, and therefore in pursuit of his lawful employment, when he received the injuries from which he died the following day.

The particular act of negligence relied upon by respondent is that the defendant's wires were maintained in an unguarded, exposed, and dangerous position, and without proper warnings or barriers of any kind to prevent employees of the Valley Ice Company from coming in contact with appellant's live wires.

Appellant, by its answer, has denied negligence upon its part, and has affirmatively pleaded sole negligence on the part of the deceased, Fike, and also contributory negligence on the part of the deceased. The appellant's main contention is "that the evidence in the case shows without question, that the death of Fike was the proximate result of his own negligence, and that a directed verdict should have been given for the defendant."

[1] With this contention we cannot agree, for it is well settled that the question of contributory negligence, like that of negligence, is a question for the jury, and only when the facts are clear and undisputed, and when no other inference than that of negligence or contributory negligence can be drawn from such facts, is the court authorized in withdrawing the question from the consideration of the jury. Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 400, 53 P. 942, 66 Am. St. Rep. 39; Nagle v. Cal. Southern R. Co., 88 Cal. 86, 25 P. 1106; Fernandes v. Sacramento City Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 45; Orcutt v. Pacific Coast

Railroad Co., 85 Cal. 291, 24 P. 661; Shade v. Bay Counties Power Co., 152 Cal. 10, 92 P. 62; Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., 102 Cal. 143, 34 P. 618, 36 P. 407; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513; and many other cases that could be cited.

In Stephenson v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, the court said:

"The nonsuit was properly denied. * * * Where the facts are admitted or proven without contradiction the court will determine whether or not they establish negligence, or show contributory negligence; but where the conclusion is open to debate it is one for the jury under proper instructions from the court."

Again, in Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, the court said upon this subject:

"It is only where no fact is left in doubt, and no deduction or inference other than negligence can be drawn by the jury from the evidence, that the court can say, as a matter of law, that contributory negligence is established. Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury."

There is a very wide difference between the inferences drawn and the conclusions reached by appellant from the testimony in this case and those contended for by respondent, which emphasizes the fact that reasonable minds might reach different conclusions from the same testimony and therefore, in such case, it is a question of fact for the jury to determine.

[2] We are of the opinion that the verdict of the jury finds ample support in the evidence, when all the facts and circumstances of the case are taken into consideration; and especially when it was shown that the deceased was a common laborer; had only been employed by the Valley Ice Company for 4 or 5 days; had never lived in a house that contained electric lights; was entirely ignorant of the high voltage contained in these wires; that neither deceased nor Stanford, his foreman were ever upon the roof of the building; the location of the holes had never been pointed out to either of them, and deceased had received no warning of the danger lurking in the live wires on the roof of the building. The holes that deceased had assisted in patching underneath the roof were many feet apart, and the holes that were to be filled on top of the roof did not extend through the roof, and no physical barrier of any kind was placed at any point on either roof which would prevent a person from coming in contact with the high-voltage wires.

[3] It will also be remembered that the defendant company had maintained galvanized iron screens 7 feet high on the old building, which completely protected any one on the roof of the old building from coming in contact with these high-voltage wires, but failed to construct any screen whatsoever between the new building, where the people were working, and these high-power wires. Appellant admits they had no screen or barrier between the roofs of the old and new buildings and relies wholly upon the warning signs upon the posts, which were, as above stated, some 10 feet from the wires, as a sufficient warning sign. Whether this was sufficient warning under all of the facts and circumstances in this case was likewise a question of fact for the jury. It was therefore perfectly proper for the court to submit the question of negligence to the jury.

Appellant seeks to bring this case within the rule laid down in such cases as Shade v. Bay Counties Power Co., 152 Cal. 10, 92 P. 62, and Jacobson v. Northwestern Pacific Railway Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3, and similar cases. In each of those cases the court held that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. But the facts in those cases are very different in many respects from the facts in the case at bar. A careful reading of the Shade Case will show that he was not engaged in any business; was traveling for pleasure; had been warned and knew of the danger of coming in contact with the live wires; with full knowledge of the dangerous character of the wires heedlessly and recklessly placed himself in a mose dangerous position. In fact, Shade was simply attempting a "foolhardy proposition." In the Jacobson Case, Jacobson was expressly warned of the dangerous character of the platform; there was no occasion for his going upon the platform; he was entirely outside of his duties; was actuated solely by motives of curiosity or for his own convenience; was not in the performance of any duty enjoined upon him by his employer, but, in strict violation of the instructions of his employer, entered the forbidden zone, and was killed by the high-voltage wires that he had been warned to stay away from.

Likewise, in all the other cases cited by appellant, it appears that the injured party knew of the dangerous character of the coming in contact with the live wires, and after knowing such danger, either through forgetfulness or after their duties had been performed, through motives of curiosity or convenience, placed themselves in a dangerous position.

In all those cases cited by appellant, there were at least two elements present which are missing in the instant case: First, lack of knowledge on the part of Fike of the propensities of electricity and the dangerous character of the high-voltage wires on the roof of the building; second, express warning of the danger incurred in approaching near these heavily charged transmission wires.

[4] It is also contended by appellant:

"That the evidence shows that deceased was a trespasser or, at best, a bare licensee in going upon the roof of the Valley Ice Company plant, and that he put himself in the way of an obvious and well-understood danger. Having done so he is guilty of negligence, which bars any recovery by his administratrix as a matter of law."

It is obvious from what we have already said that we cannot agree with this contention. On the contrary, it seems to us clearly established from the evidence that deceased had the right to be on the roof of the new building of the Valley Ice Company, and was there with the knowledge and consent of appellant, and in the performance of his duties as an employee of the ice company, carrying out the orders of his superior, Mr. Stanford, and the jury was amply justified in so concluding by its verdict.

It is difficult to conceive how Fike could have been a trespasser or a bare licensee in being upon the roof of the building when he had been expressly directed by his foreman, Mr. Stanford, to go there. Stanford said to Fike just a few minutes before the accident:

"We will go up now on the roof and finish up there—put some tar asphaltum in the holes."

Mr. Fike certainly would not fall into the class of a trespasser or licensee simply because he ascended the ladder and reached the roof a few minutes in advance of Stanford after receiving the instructions above mentioned.

[5] It is next claimed by appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury as to what constitutes a preponderance of the evidence. A part of the instruction complained of is as follows:

"If the weight of all the evidence in the case tending to prove the facts is of greater weight than the evidence tending to disprove such facts, then the plaintiff has proven such facts by a preponderance of the evidence, and is entitled to a verdict in her favor. Preponderance of evidence is not determined by the number of witnesses."

This passage taken alone is, of course, erroneous. This precise situation was presented in the case of Ergo v. Merced Falls Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 339, 119 P. 103, and what the court said there of the situation is applicable here to wit:

"It is obvious that the evidence tending to prove a fact might be so slight that it would fail to satisfy the jury of the existence of the fact, and yet it might be of greater weight than other evidence introduced which would tend to disprove the fact. In such case the fact could not be said to be proven either by a preponderance of the evidence or at all. But this passage cannot be thus taken from the context, nor separated from the other instructions given."

This passage complained of, above quoted, was contained in an instruction pointing out to the jury the difference between the proof beyond a reasonable doubt that was necessary to justify a conviction in a criminal case, and the proof by preponderance of the evidence necessary in a civil case.

The court instructed the jury that the entire case should be considered together, and that all the evidence must be taken into consideration before arriving at a verdict, and in at least two other instructions fully and correctly stated the law with reference to a preponderance of the evidence. All the instructions must be considered together, and when so considered they fully and correctly state the law applicable to all phases of the case. Therefore we cannot say that the passage from the instructions first quoted was of any injury to appellant. There is some confusion in the record as to just what instructions were in fact given and refused. One of the instructions claimed by appellant to have been refused by the court which defined a trespasser and a bare licensee was in fact given. However, this confusion was eliminated by a stipulation between the respective attorneys after the case was submitted to this court.

[6] It is also contended by appellant that the court erred in rejecting certain evidence offered by appellant. This relates to questions asked of the witness Erskine, who was manager of the Valley Ice Company, relative to whether or not he had given general instructions to the employees of the Valley Ice Company of the danger of coming in contact with the high-tension wires on the roof of the building. Some of the questions were as follows:

"Q. What instructions did you give your employee (respondent claims the word should be employees) with reference to electric wire line that may have come into the building?"

To this question an objection was interposed by respondent that it was irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial unless it included Mr. Fike. The court said:

"I think it is enough if you show actual instructions to Mr. Fike by some one; that would be enough."

Thereupon the following question was asked:

"Q. I will ask you this; were any of your employees ever permitted to go on that roof, unless expressly directed to do so? A. They had no occasion."

After one or two similar questions were asked of the witness Erskine by appellant's counsel and considerable argument between respective counsel, the court said:

"If it was a question of notice, that whatever was said by Stanford would be relevant, by general instructions I don't think it would be relevant on cross-examination."

Thus the court opened the door for appellant to prove, if it could, that any instructions were given to Fike by any one warning him to look out for the wires on the roof. It is entirely immaterial what instructions Mr.

Erskine gave to other employees if they were not shown to have been given to Fike. Appellant did not attempt to show that deceased, Fike had received any instructions from any one about the danger of the high-voltage wires on the roof of the building. Therefore the court's ruling under the circumstances was entirely proper.

After a careful examination of the rather voluminous record, we find no substantial error therein.

I concur: NOURSE, J.

73 Cal. App. 732

GIBBS v. HERSMAN et al. (Civ. 5122.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 27, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 24, 1925.)

1. Sales ⟸68—Term "suitable for Eastern shipment" in contract for sale of grapes defined.

Term "suitable for Eastern shipment," as used in contract for sale of grapes, has a definite meaning in the grape shipping industry, indicating a condition which will permit grapes to be shipped to, and arrive at, Eastern points in a sound condition, allowing normal time for transportation.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1)—Finding of court not open to review, where supported by substantial evidence.

In action for breach of contract for purchase and sale of grapes, finding of court, that buyer was justified in rescinding contract because crop had become unsuitable for Eastern market, was not open for review, where supported by substantial evidence.

3. Sales ⟸85(2)—Termination of contract for purchase of grapes held authorized by terms of contract.

Where contract for purchase of grapes called for fruit crop suitable for Eastern shipment, provided for cancellation by buyer for any reason beyond buyer's control affecting his ability to perform contract, and providing that seller assumed all risk of loss and depreciation of undelivered part of crop, the buyer was authorized to cancel contract where it was shown that grapes were spoiled by rains and frosts prior to completion of deliveries.

4. Contracts ⟸309(2)—Where parties contract with reference to continued existence of matter to which it relates, perishment or destruction of such matter will excuse performance.

Where parties contract with reference to the continued existence of a thing, the subsequent perishment or destruction of the thing will excuse the performance, and, where the performance necessarily depends on its continued existence, the condition is implied by law that the impossibility of performance, because of its destruction, shall excuse the performance.

5. Trial ⟸396(3)—Cancellation of contract for reasons found by trial court held authorized by contract and pleadings.

In action for breach of the contract to purchase grapes, where court found that defendants' refusal to accept crop was because fruit had become unsuitable for shipment on account of rain and frost, held, that findings in these respects were in accord with defendants' pleadings in their answer, it being there alleged that, because of fruit being rendered unsuitable for shipment directly affecting defendants' ability to perform contract, contract was canceled pursuant to terms therein.

6. Sales ⟸119—Defendant held entitled to cancellation of contract, not only pursuant to cancellation section therein but independently thereof as well.

Where grapes were spoiled by frost and rain, held, defendants were not only entitled to cancel contract pursuant to cancellation section of contract but independently thereof because they were excused from performance, as finding of court that grapes were spoiled was in effect finding that subject-matter of contract had been destroyed and it was immaterial whether termination of contract was based on cancellation of contract or excuse for performance.

7. Contracts ⟸161—Whole of each contract must be taken together and effect given each part thereof, each clause helping to interpret other.

Whole of each contract must be taken together and effect given each part thereof, each clause helping to interpret other.

8. Sales ⟸85(2)—Spoiling of grapes held to prevent delivery, acceptance, and shipment thereof within cancellation clause of contract.

Where contract for purchase of grapes contained seven specific cancellation clauses, and the eighth was general in operation and effect, and included all reasons beyond the control of the buyer, which caused delay or wholly prevented delivery, acceptance, and shipment of fruit contracted for, held, that the spoiling of grapes by frost and rain prevented delivery, acceptance, and shipment thereof within such general cancellation clause.

9. Sales ⟸85(2)—Harvest, delivery, and culling of grapes not necessary before buyer had right to reject them under contract.

Under contract for the sale of grapes, where grapes were spoiled by frost and rain, held, that it was not a prerequisite to buyer's right to reject grapes that they be first harvested, delivered, and culled.

10. Sales ⟸181(11)—Record held not to show that buyer was not diligent in exercising legal rights under contract or acted in an unwarranted manner thereunder.

In an action for breach of contract for sale of grapes, held, that there was nothing in the record to indicate that buyers were not diligent in exercise of their legal rights or to have acted in an unwarranted manner in causing delay of delivery of grapes or in canceling contract.

11. Sales ⊂=54—Party entitled to have terms of contract carried into effect irrespective of harshness on other party, where voluntarily entered into and admittedly legal.

Where parties voluntarily entered into contract for sale of grapes, wherein time of delivery was under absolute control of buyer, and seller assumed risk in dealing with product prior to delivery, buyer was entitled to have contract carried into effect irrespective of harshness upon seller, inasmuch as it was admittedly legal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Irene M. Gibbs against H. S. Hersman and another, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of the Gilroy Packing Company. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bradley & Supple, of San Francisco, and Jones & Boalt, of San Jose, for appellant.

Crawford & Mayock, of Gilroy, and Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. The purpose of this action was to recover damages for the alleged breach of two written contracts for the purchase and sale of wine grapes. Judgment was for the defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

At all times herein mentioned defendants were engaged in the business of buying and shipping wine grapes near Gilroy, and plaintiff was a grower of grapes in that locality. On September 21, 1922, the parties entered into a contract calling for the delivery of 50 tons of grapes, suitable for Eastern shipment, at $95 a ton, and on September 28, 1922, made a second contract for the purchase and sale of the balance of plaintiff's crop, estimated to be 50 tons, at $100 a ton. Defendants accepted delivery of approximately 19½ tons of grapes under both contracts, whereupon, and on November 3, 1922, they refused to accept further deliveries upon the ground that said grapes had been rendered unsuitable and unfit for Eastern shipment as a result of rain and frost. The main question presented for determination is whether or not the trial court was correct in its conclusion that the termination of these transactions by defendants was authorized by the provisions of the contracts.

The documents were prepared on printed forms furnished by defendants, and are substantially alike, except as to the quantity and variety of grapes, and the price to be paid therefor. Those portions of the contract material for consideration read as follows:

"That in consideration of one dollar, and other valuable consideration hereinafter specified, the seller has sold, and the buyer has bought, all of the hereinafter mentioned fruit crop, suitable for Eastern shipment, produced during the year 1922 on the following described premises:

"Irene Gibbs Ranch, Valley View Vineyard, Gilroy.

"The seller agrees to pick and deliver all of said fruit at his own expense, in good condition, entirely free from mildew, or smut, or rain, or sand damage, and free from any damage whatsoever, and at the times directed by the buyer. All clippings, faulty, and damaged fruit to be weighed and charged back to seller as culls.

"The contract is understood by the parties hereto to constitute an immediate sale transferring title to buyer, but until delivery has been completed, seller agrees to, and does, assume all risks of loss, depreciation, or damage, of whatsoever kind or nature, to any undelivered part of said crops.

"Seller declares he is sole and absolute owner of the crops herein sold, and a sale of the real property shall not affect the rights of the buyer herein. * * *

"Vineyard Run—It is understood and agreed that grapes when purchased under this contract and designated as 'vineyard run' shall be sound ripe grapes, free from mildew, smut, or rain damage and shall contain not more than five (5) per cent. by count of raisins or immature sunburned grapes, and shall comply with any rule or rules, law or laws, regulating the shipment, sale, and distribution of unpacked grapes. * * *

"The buyer shall issue proper receipt or weight certificate covering each delivery of fruit made by the seller, and shall make cash payment within 10 days for said fruit upon surrender of such receipt or weight certificate, less weight of culls, shown on regular cull weight certificate, at its office in Gilroy, Cal., or upon surrender of such weight receipt or weight certificates to its authorized representative at Gilroy, Cal.

"In the event of a strike, quarantine, boycott, embargo, fire, or failure of transportation companies to provide refrigerator cars, shortage of box material, or other reasons beyond our control, directly or indirectly affecting buyer's ability to perform this contract, buyer may cancel this contract, or extend time of delivery for a period equal to that so lost, and may designate a different reasonable point of delivery, and buyer shall not be held liable for any damage that may occur through such delay. * * *

"Time is of the essence of this agreement, and no understanding other than herein expressed shall vary or modify this transaction."

[1] The term "suitable for Eastern shipment," used in said contracts, has a definite meaning in the grape-shipping industry, indicating a condition that will permit the fruit to be shipped to, and arrive at, Eastern points in sound condition, allowing normal time for transportation.

It appears from the evidence that the grape-shipping season in the vicinity of Gilroy begins between the 5th and the 15th days of September and continues until about November 15th, the heaviest shipping being done in October. During the entire shipping season of 1922, a serious shortage of refrigerator cars existed, due to strikes and also to an embargo on Eastern shipments declared by various transportation companies. All available cars were distributed to the shippers in proportion to the amount of acreage contracted for. Sometimes the car shortage was less tensive than at other times. Under ordinary conditions it required 12 days to transport grapes from Gilroy to New York, but during the strike period double that time was consumed. These unfavorable transportation conditions necessarily limited and delayed acceptance of deliveries of grapes, and, consequently, up to October 27, less than one-fifth of the plaintiff's entire crop had been delivered and accepted under both contracts. On October 27 and 28, the regions of Gilroy were visited by rains and frost, the effects of which weakened the fiber of the grapes, produced mildew, and thereby rendered the grapes unsuitable for Eastern shipment. Thereupon, and on November 3, 1922, defendants informed plaintiff that they would not accept the balance of the crop. Plaintiff at that time protested that the grapes were not sufficiently damaged to disqualify the remainder of the crop from acceptance under the contracts, and requested that an inspection thereof be made by disinterested persons, but defendants failed to respond to this proposition and stood upon their refusal to accept the same. Later, under date of November 8, 1922, plaintiff wrote defendants to the effect that she was harvesting and marketing, for defendants' account, all grapes covered by said contracts, and would hold defendants responsible for the difference between the amount of the proceeds received from the sale of the grapes and the contract prices. Between the 6th and 11th days of November heavy rains occurred in that locality. On November 11, defendants wrote plaintiff as follows:

"You are hereby notified that we are ready at any time to receive the black grapes which we contracted to buy from you, and we hereby notify you to deliver the same, providing the grapes are undamaged, and in fit and proper condition for shipping as provided in our contract. * * *"

Subsequent to the refusal of defendants to accept the grapes on November 3, however, plaintiff sold the balance of the crop to others for the best obtainable market price, realizing therefrom $7,245.01 less than she would have received from defendants under the prices fixed by said contracts. Plaintiff's action is for the recovery of that difference in amount.

[2] The trial court found that the existence of said embargo and strikes, and the failure of transportation companies to provide cars, directly affected the ability of defendants to perform their contracts; that on October 27 and 28 the grape crop was rendered unsuitable and unfit, by rains and frost, for Eastern shipment, and that said defendants, on the 3d day of November, 1922, notified the plaintiff that said contracts were canceled, by reason of said crops of grapes having become unsuitable and unfit for Eastern shipment, as a result of rain and frost.

[3] The decision of the trial court upon these issues of fact is not open to review, inasmuch as its determination thereon is supported by substantial evidence. We are concerned, therefore, with only the legal question of whether the termination of said contracts by the defendants under the circumstances shown by the findings, and upon the grounds stated therein, was authorized by the terms of said contracts. We are of the opinion that the conclusion reached by the trial court upon this question must be sustained.

It will be noted that the contracts called for a "fruit crop suitable for Eastern shipment." The grade of grapes specified constituted the paramount feature of the contracts. The quality of the grapes to be delivered was further particularized by a provision requiring that they should "be sound grapes, free from mildew, smut, or rain damage. * * *" The cancellation section of said contracts, after enumerating seven specific causes for cancellation, provided that for "any other reason beyond our (buyer's) control, directly or indirectly affecting buyer's ability to perform the contract, buyer may cancel this contract. * * *" It was furthermore expressly provided that until completion of delivery the "seller agrees to, and does, assume all risks of loss, depreciation, or damage, of whatsoever kind and nature, to any undelivered part of said crop." In view of the established fact that the grapes were spoiled by rains and frost prior to completion of delivery, these plain provisions of the contracts manifestly gave to the defendants the right to terminate the sale thereunder, for the reason that the subject-matter of the contracts has been destroyed, and the sole purpose for which the engagements were entered into had been defeated, namely, the obtaining of grapes suitable for Eastern shipment.

[4] It is a fundamental rule of contracts that where, from the nature of the contract, it is evident that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the thing to which it relates, the subsequent perishing or destruction of the thing will excuse the performance; and, consequently, when the contract relates to any dealing with specific things, in which the performance necessarily depends on the existence of the particular things, the condition is implied by law that the impossibility arising from the destruction of the things, without fault in the party, shall excuse the performance, because, from the nature of the contract, it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the subject of the contract. 9 Cyc. 631, quoted approvingly in Potts Drug Co. v. Benedict, 156 Cal. 322, 104 P. 432, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 609; 6 Cal. Jur. p. 443; 5 Page on Contracts (2d Ed.) § 2709. True, title to all grapes grown by plaintiff and suitable for Eastern shipment was, by these contracts, vested in the buyers at the time the contracts were signed, but it was also provided, as already pointed out, that until completion of delivery the seller agreed to and did "assume all risks of loss, depreciation, or damage, of whatsoever kind and nature, to any undelivered part of said crop." It necessarily follows that when the elements spoiled the undelivered portion of the crop so that the grapes became useless for the purpose for which the purchase and sale thereof was made, the loss fell upon plaintiff as the seller.

[5] Plaintiff contends that the cancellation of the contracts, for the reasons found by the court, was not authorized by the contracts or the pleadings, and that, therefore, there has been in fact no legal cancellation thereof. Supporting this contention, plaintiff argues that the contracts embodied two distinct features, one dealing with their performance, which had particular reference to the alternative to be exercised by the buyer in the event the fruit was damaged, and the other having to do with the cancellation of the contracts; that performance of the contracts by defendants was a necessary prerequisite to the exercise of their right to reject damaged fruit, that is, that it was necessary for them first to perform the contracts by receiving the fruit and then afterwards ascertain the damage, if any, and charge it back to the seller under the provision of the contracts requiring that "all clippings, faulty, and damaged fruit (should) to be weighed and charged back to seller as culls"; that such was the exclusive remedy available to the buyer in the matter of rejecting damaged crops. In reference to the other feature of the contract permitting cancellation, plaintiff contends that the buyer was restricted to the specific causes therein stated, which, she claims, do not include the element of damaged crops. It is further asserted that these two remedies, arising under different phases of the contract, were inconsistent with each other; that both could not be invoked, nor was one available to accomplish the purposes of the other.

We are satisfied the propositions thus advanced by plaintiff are not maintainable. It may be conceded, as plaintiff contends, that final refusal of defendants to accept the balance of the crop was based, as found by the trial court, upon the fact that the fruit was rendered unsuitable, on account of rain and frost, for Eastern shipment; and it is also true that the matters set forth in the findings, relating to the car shortage, were important only for the purpose of showing that defendants were justified in delaying deliveries of grapes, and that those justifiable delays directly affected the ability of defendants to perform their contracts up to the time the fruit was ruined by the elements for Eastern shipment. But the findings in this respect are in full accord with the defense pleaded in defendants' answer, it being there alleged, after setting forth all of these facts and circumstances, as follows:

"Defendants further aver, in that behalf, that on or about the said date, and by reason of said matters hereinbefore set forth, which directly affected their ability to perform said contracts, and each of them, the defendants notified said plaintiff that said contracts, and each of them, were and thereafter would be canceled, pursuant to the terms of said contracts, and each of them."

[6] And in reference to the questions of the construction of the contracts, and of the availability of defendants' remedies thereunder, it is our opinion that not only pursuant to the cancellation section of said contracts, but also independently of it, defendants were entitled to terminate said contracts for the reasons assigned by the court in its findings, which were in effect that the subject-matter of said contracts had been destroyed; and it is entirely immaterial, we think, whether such termination be construed as a "cancellation" of the contracts, or "an excuse for nonperformance," for both remedies arise out of the same state of facts and are, to all intents and purposes, controlled by the same legal principles. In claiming that the so-called cancellation section did not allow defendants to cancel the contracts on account of spoiled fruit, plaintiff fails, we think, to give full effect or proper interpretation to the concluding portion thereof, which allows defendants to cancel the contracts for reasons beyond their control and affecting their ability to perform the same.

[7, 8] The whole of each contract must be taken together, and effect must be given to every part thereof, each clause helping to interpret the other. Civ. Code, § 1641. When the parties entered into their engagements they must have contemplated that the vital condition of fulfillment was that only such grapes be delivered, received, and shipped as proved suitable for Eastern shipment. The seven specific causes contained in said cancellation section obviously related to matters which might either delay or wholly prevent the accomplishment of that purpose, namely, the delivery, acceptance, and shipment of such fruit as was suitable for Eastern shipment; and the eighth clause of said cancellation section, being general in its operation and effect, manifestly included all other reasons, beyond the control of the buyers, which caused delay or wholly prevented the delivery, acceptance, and shipment of a grade of fruit contracted for. The grapes having been rendered unsuitable by the elements for the purpose for which they were purchased and sold, therefore did in fact wholly prevent delivery, acceptance, and shipment thereof, made performance of the contracts an impossibility, and consequently constituted ground for cancellation.

The subject-matter of these contracts was highly perishable, and of necessity required expeditious handling even if delivered in condition for Eastern shipment; consequently, the interests of the seller as well as of the buyer demanded that the right of cancellation be exercised as to the whole crop if the fruit did not measure up to the high standard prescribed by the contracts; it would therefore seem that the only reasonable and fair construction that can be placed upon the general clause of said cancellation section is that impairment of the subject-matter of the contracts, arising from causes beyond the control of the buyer, which made it unfit for the purpose for which it was purchased, warranted cancellation of the contracts.

[9] But, as above stated, aside from the question of cancellation under the clause of the contract just adverted to, we are convinced that upon ascertainment of the fact that the subject-matter of the contracts had been rendered useless, defendants were entitled, under the fundamental rule of contracts hereinbefore mentioned, to terminate said contracts on that ground. And, in order to do so, it was not necessary, as plaintiff contends, that all of the fruit should have been first harvested, delivered, and culled, for the reason that the crop was not partially but entirely spoiled. It was not a case of sorting out from a larger lot the faulty and damaged fruit, and it would have been an obviously idle act for the seller to have delivered the balance of the crop, consisting of some 90-odd tons, to the buyer merely for the purpose of having the entire lot weighed and charged back to the seller as faulty fruit; besides, by such an operation the interests of the sellers would have suffered more than those of the buyers, because, in addition to the expense of hauling and delivery, the delay occasioned thereby would doubtless have affected subsequent sale of the crop by the grower to local markets.

[10] We find nothing in the record indicating that defendants were not diligent in the exercise of their legal rights under the contracts, or that they have acted in a manner not warranted by the provisions thereof. True, deliveries of grapes were delayed at defendants' instance until finally the rains and frosts came and spoiled the grapes for Eastern shipment; but owing to transportation conditions it was the legal right of defendants, under the plain reading of the contracts, to effectuate such delays, and the evidence given by transportation officials, to the effect that the car shortage situation looked brighter sometimes than it did at others, is sufficient to show that defendants' conduct in the premises, both as to causing delays in delivery and in failing to cancel the contracts absolutely upon that ground before the grapes were spoiled, was based upon the faith of the information received by defendants from those officials. But as soon as it was ascertained that the rains and frosts of October 27 and 28 had ruined the grapes for Eastern shipment, the car shortage question ceased to be a factor, and defendants immediately notified plaintiff that they could not accept the balance of the crop.

[11] Plaintiff during oral argument complained that the contracts, in thus giving to the buyers absolute control of the delivery of the crop, were harsh upon the grower. This was not denied by the defendants, but as an offset thereto defendants called attention to the risk assumed by them as buyers and shippers in dealing with a highly perishable product, even when there was no interference with deliveries or shipment. However that may be, the parties having voluntarily entered into such agreements, the provisions and purposes of which were admittedly legal, defendants are entitled to have the terms thereof carried into effect.

The contents of the letter written by defendants to plaintiff, under date of November 11, is unimportant, for the reason that the contracts at that time had already been canceled; defendants on November 3 having expressly refused to proceed with the sale, and plaintiff acting upon such refusal thereafter disposed of the grapes to other parties. The question of waiver of the right to cancel the contracts upon the ground of car shortage conditions is also immaterial, because final refusal to take the crop was not placed on that ground.

The other points made by plaintiff were incidental to those theories advanced by plaintiff, which we hold are not maintainable.

The judgment is affirmed.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸185(7)—Departmental rule relating to constructive service of charges and notice of trial on police officer held not to conflict with charter.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸185(11)—Presumption in favor of board of police commissioners' judgment of dismissal.

Every presumption is in favor of validity of judgment of board of police commissioners dismissing a policeman, where it contains recital showing jurisdiction to hear and determine the charges.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Proceeding in mandamus by Robert A. Curtin against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment denying the writ, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. J. Dunne and R. H. Morrow, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Peery, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. On October 14, 1918, the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco dismissed the petitioner herein, Robert A. Curtin, as a member of the San Francisco police department, for disobedience to orders, to wit, failing to report for duty in compliance with the order of the police commissioners and his superior officers. Nearly three years thereafter, to wit, on September 24, 1921, petitioner applied for reinstatement, but his application was denied. About a year subsequent to such denial, and on August 24, 1922, he commenced this proceeding in mandamus against said police commission and the individual members thereof to compel his restoration as a member of said department. Judgment was given for defendants, and petitioner appeals.

The findings of the trial court, which, we think, are supported by substantial evidence, disclose the following facts:

For several years prior to his dismissal Curtin had been a police officer in said city, and on September 30, 1918, submitted his resignation to said commission, protesting that he was doing so because he had theretofore applied for a leave of absence for the period of the war, but which leave was not granted. In his resignation he further stated that for the few following months he would engage in agricultural pursuits and assist in the management of a large cattle ranch, but if called in the draft he would enter the service, and, at the conclusion of the war, demand reinstatement as a member of the police department. On that date, September 30, 1918, said commissioners, for reasons which appeared to them sufficient, refused to accept said resignation, and ordered Curtin to report for regular duty. Under date of October 1, Curtin sent a second letter of resignation, this time to Captain Shea, his superior officer, stating that in doing so he was protecting his rights to reinstatement; he further added: "I will not report for duty to-morrow, October 1st, 1918." He was, nevertheless, ordered to report for duty on his regular watch commencing the next morning at 8 o'clock, which he failed to do; and thereupon, and on October 2, 1918, Captain Shea filed charges against Curtin, which were verified before Chief of Police D. A. White, charging Curtin with disobedience of orders, and specifying the particular acts of such disobedience. Curtin was thereupon suspended from his position, and said charges were set for trial on October 7, 1918.

On October 2, 1918, Officer John P. Collins called at Curtin's residence, No. 1147 Sanchez street, in said city, for the purpose of serving copies of said charges, notice of trial and the order of suspension, but was informed by the landlady of said premises that Curtin had departed from San Francisco for Chinese Camp, California. Thereupon said copies were left at said residence in the room occupied by the said Curtin, and where his personal effects still remained. On that same day other copies of said documents were posted in a conspicuous place in the Harbor police station, that being the station to which Curtin was required to report for duty, and copies of said charges, together with a notice of suspension signed by the chief of police, and a notice directing Curtin to appear for trial of said charges on the 7th day of October, 1918, at 7:30 p. m. of said day before the police commissioners were also sent by registered mail in the official envelope of said commission, bearing a return indorsement, addressed to the said Robert A. Curtin at Chinese Camp, Cal., with the postage thereon prepaid. As a matter of fact, Curtin departed for Tuolumne and Mariposa counties on the morning of October 2, passing through Chinese Camp in order to reach the ranch on which he afterwards remained for many months. On October 7, 1918, Curtin failed to appear in answer to said charges, and the hearing was regularly postponed to October 14, 1918, at which time Curtin again failed to appear; whereupon said commissioners proceeded with the hearing, received evidence supporting the charges, found Curtin guilty thereof, and by resolution dismissed him from said police department, the vacancy caused by his dismissal being shortly afterwards filled by the appointment of another officer to the position. Two days prior to said hearing, to wit, on October 12, 1918, Curtin through one Carlon, a fellow police officer, sent to the office of the chief of police his star, book of rules, and club.

It appears from the evidence that Curtin did not at any time enter the military service. During the several months he was engaged in cattle raising, he visited San Francisco "very frequently, once a month or once in two or three months in three or four months," the length of these visits being "two or three days, maybe one day and maybe three days," but that during those visits he did not call upon or get in touch with the police department, nor did he at any time make inquiries as to the disposition of his case before said commissioners.

Although Curtin denied ever having received said registered letter, it was shown that said letter was never returned, and, for the purpose of proving that he did receive it, evidence was offered of certain circumstances showing that the Curtin family was extensively known in Tuolumne county and in the regions of Chinese Camp, also the manner in which they received their mail, and that soon after October 15, 1918, Officer Carlon, who also had relatives living in those parts, while passing through that country, delivered at the Curtin ranch certain mail he had obtained for them on the way in, although in this regard he testified he had no recollection of having delivered a registered letter. Irrespective of whether or not Curtin did receive said letter, the court found that on December 2, 1918, he had actual knowledge of his dismissal, and he admits that during January or February, 1919, he learned of that fact.

Appellant contends, first, that the proceedings pursuant to which he was dismissed from the police force are void for want of jurisdiction, it being claimed that, notwithstanding the rule of the department permitting constructive service of the charges and order for trial, the city charter requires personal service, and does not authorize constructive service; and, secondly, that assuming constructive service is permissible, no compliance with the constructive service rule of the police department (rule 41) has been established.

Respondents urge at the outset that in view of the facts already related, and the further fact that appellant's proceeding was not commenced until nearly four years after his dismissal, his cause of action, if any he had, became barred by the statute of limitations (subdivision 1, § 338, Code Civ. Proc.), and by laches. Such were the conclusions reached by the trial court, there being express findings to the effect that said statute of limitations applied, and also that the proceeding was barred by the laches of appellant in delaying the bringing of said proceeding for more than three years.

[1] We are of the opinion that the contentions made by respondents and the conclusions reached by the trial court must be sustained. Wittman v. Board of Police Commissioners, 19 Cal. App. 229, 125 P. 265; Kramer v. Board of Police Commissioners, 39 Cal. App. 396, 179 P. 216; Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 32 Cal. App. 392, 163 P. 69; Harby v. Board of Education, 2 Cal. App. 418, 83 P. 1081; Jones v. Board of Police Commissioners, 141 Cal. 96, 74 P. 696. In Wittman v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, where a three-year period elapsed before suit was brought, it was said:

"Appellant was in form dismissed from the department on the 24th day of March, 1905, and ever since has been debarred from exercising any of the functions of a member of the department. For reasons not now necessary to be discussed, he claims that such attempted dismissal was illegal and void, and did not have the effect to remove him from his position of captain of police. It is the dismissal from the department that really lies at the bottom of appellant's cause of action. It is this alleged wrong that he seeks to have redressed by the action of the court invoked more than three years after its commission. The denial of his right to hold a position in the police department occurred when he was formally dismissed by the board of police commissioners from the department. This dismissal occurred at a definitely fixed time, and was an unequivocal denial of his right to longer hold the position of captain of police or any other position in the department. If his contention as to the illegality of such dismissal is well founded, he could immediately upon his dismissal have perfected his right to the remedy by mandate by making his demand for reinstatement or assignment to duty as such captain of police.

"These considerations bring the case within the rule followed and recognized in many cases, that where a right has fully accrued except for some demand to be made as a condition precedent to legal relief, which the claimant can at any time make, if he so chooses, the cause of action has accrued for the purpose of setting the statute of limitations running." Palmer v. Palmer, 36 Mich. 487, 24 Am. Rep. 605; Harrigan v. Home Life Co., 128 Cal. 531, 548, 58 P. 180, 61 P. 99; Union Sav. Bank of San Jose v. Leiter, 145 Cal. 696, 79 P. 441; San Luis Obispo v. Gage, 139 Cal. 398, 73 P. 174; Barnes v. Glide, 117 Cal. 1, 59 Am. St. Rep. 153, 48 P. 804.

In considering the same question in the case of Kramer v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, the court used the following language:

"In addition to these deficiencies in the plaintiff's petition it may be further stated that no showing whatever is made that the position in the police department vacated by the plaintiff's resignation has not been long since filled, or that his reinstatement after so long a period has elapsed [more than three years] would not result either in ousting a successor, or in entailing the payment on the part of the municipality of two salaries for the same position. We think as to this latter point that upon the plaintiff's own affirmative showing, as well as by these deficiencies therein, he was debarred by laches from the remedy which he sought and obtained by the judgment and order for the issuance of the writ from which this appeal has been taken. Harby v. Board of Education, 2 Cal. App. 419, 83 P. 1081; Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 32 Cal. 392, 163 P. 69."

In Donovan v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, in holding that a delay of 14 months after dismissal was a bar to the remedy of certiorari, the court was even more emphatic in applying the doctrine of laches, saying:

"In the absence of a showing sufficient to excuse this delay it certainly constituted laches. While it is true, as counsel for the plaintiff contends, that mere lapse of time short of that prescribed by a statute of limitations in any given similar case will not in itself suffice to constitute laches so as to bar a remedy, nevertheless, if in addition it appears from all the circumstances of the case that prejudice must or, from the very nature of the case, may be reasonably expected to result, the remedy will be denied (Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 P. 467; Cook v. Ceas, 147 Cal. 614, 82 P. 370; McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 P. 460); and, whenever public inconvenience might result from the annulment of the proceedings sought to be reviewed, the rule of laches relative to applications for the writ is applied and enforced with particular strictness (4 Standard Encyclopedia of Law and Procedure, 912). As was stated in the case of Murphy v. Keller, 61 App. Div. 145, 70 N. Y. S. 405: 'In all proceedings of this character, where a person removed from public office is entitled to receive from the public compensation for the services he performs, if he intends to insist that his removal was illegal, or that the law entitles him to be reinstated, his application for reinstatement should be promptly made so as to protect the city from the necessity of paying two persons for the same services.' It would be contrary to common knowledge of the needs of the police department of a great city, and the well-known practice of the appointing powers to fill vacancies created in such department, to suppose that the defendants in the present case allowed the vacancy created by the dismissal of the plaintiff to long remain unfilled; and therefore it may fairly be said that the particular circumstances of the case as disclosed by the petition for the writ show with sufficient certainty that prejudice as a result of the plaintiff's laches would follow the granting of the writ."

Between the time of appellant's dismissal and the date on which he commenced this proceeding the deaths of Chief of Police White, Captain Shea, and Officer Douglass occurred, all of whom would have given material evidence to refute some of the numerous points of irregularity made by appellant against the validity of the dismissal proceedings, and the deaths of whom may be considered as having an important bearing upon the application of the doctrine of laches.

[2] We are convinced that the situation in the instant proceeding has been brought clearly within the rule of the cases above cited, which rule obviously disposes of all questions of alleged irregularity made against the validity of the dismissal proceedings, with the possible exception of the one relating to the asserted conflict between said departmental rule number 41 and the charter provision in reference to the service upon the accused officer of copies of the charges and notice of trial. Assuming that appellant may still attack the dismissal proceedings upon that ground, we are of the opinion that appellant's contention is not maintainable. We believe that said rule, allowing constructive service to be made under the circumstances stated in the rule, not only does not conflict with the charter provision, but is in entire harmony therewith, is reasonable in its operation, and wholly essential for the orderly and efficient administration of the affairs of the police department. The charter in this respect provides that the board of police commissioners has power "to prescribe rules and regulations for the government, discipline, equipment, and uniform of the department, and from time to time to alter or repeal the same, and to prescribe penalties for the violations of any such rules and regulations." Subdivision 2, § 1, art. VIII, c. III. Section 3 of the same article provides:

"No member of the department shall be subject to dismissal for any cause, or to punishment for any breach of duty or misconduct therein, except after a fair and impartial trial before the commissioners upon a verified complaint filed with the board setting forth specifically the acts complained of, and after such reasonable notice to him of the time and place *of hearing as the Board may by rule prescribe. * * " (Italics ours.)

Section 3 of rule 41, the validity of which is challenged, reads:

"3. When, after due and diligent search, a member or employee of the police department is reported by competent authority as missing, and in such case as said absence prevents personal service of notice and copy of charges filed against him, and is, in itself, a violation of the rules and regulations of the department, reasonable notice of the time and place of hearing within the provisions of section 3 of chapter VII of article VIII of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco shall be deemed as follows: A copy of the charges, setting forth the time and place of hearing, with notice to report to answer said charges, shall be sent by mail to the defendant's last known place of residence, at least five days previous to the time set for the hearing of the charges, and a written notice addressed to the defendant ordering him to report to answer charges, setting forth the fact that charges have been filed against him; the particulars of time and place of hearing shall be conspicuously posted in the station or place where the defendant should report for duty at least five days previous to the time set for the hearing of the charges."

[3] Besides the fact that there is nothing in the language of the charter provision indicating that only personal service is permitted, we think the peculiar circumstances of this case are sufficiently convincing to show that the requirement of personal service is not, and ought not be, necessary. Appellant was a member of the department, and therefore subject to and had knowledge of its rules and regulations. Owing to the exigencies of war the ranks of the police department were being depleted of its younger members so that a real demand for police officers existed. In open defiance of the order of the commission that appellant remain on duty as a member of the department rather than take up agricultural pursuits, he quit the department, and left the city for regions wherein it was extremely impractical, if not impossible at that season of the year, to secure personal service upon him, and knowing, too, that charges of disobedience and dismissal would necessarily follow the order of the commission refusing his resignation. If, under those or like circumstances—for instance, an officer leaving the state without permission or embarking upon the high seas—the department were compelled to suspend action in reference to his case, and thus allow the vacancy caused by his absence to remain unfilled until personal service could be had upon the absentee, the administration of police affairs would apparently be much interfered with if not seriously impaired. As before stated, the language of the charter provision does not in terms require personal notice, and, moreover, no reason has been presented to show that such was the intent or meaning thereof.

There is no merit in appellant's contention that the rule upon which these charges were based was violative of the charter in that said rule failed to prescribe a penalty. Section 2 of article VIII, chapter VII of the charter, itself fixes the penalties for members "guilty of any offense, or violation of rules or regulations" of the department, and one of those penalties is "dismissal from the department." The questions of the sufficiency of the verification of the charges and of the charges themselves are, at best, irregularities which, as already pointed out, may not be taken advantage of by appellant on account of his laches.

[4] The minutes of the board of police commissioners, which, in effect constitute the judgment of dismissal, contain recitals showing jurisdiction to hear and determine the charges. Every presumption is in favor of the validity thereof. Gaylord v. Pasadena, 175 Cal. 433, 166 P. 348. The judgment of dismissal by the board was one that was clearly within their power under the charter to render, and, being valid on its face, was and is, in view of the running of the statute of limitations and of appellant's laches, binding upon appellant. People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 P. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 448.

The judgment is affirmed.

73 Cal. App. 769

WEINBERG CO. v. HELLER. (Civ. 4005.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 13, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 24, 1925.)

1. Contracts ⊜206—Party, agreeing to pay portion of expenses of proposed litigation, held bound to pay portion of costs in case settling questions involved.

Where party, interested in actions to abate nuisance from overflowing lands, agreed with another party to pay certain proportion of costs and expenses incurred, including costs of appeal, and, on advice of attorney, action was brought in name of the other party to agreement, she was bound to pay specified portion of costs and expenses incurred in such case, regardless of fact that contract provided for separate suits, and actions were separately instituted, as against contention that she did not contract with the other party, but jointly with him to employ attorneys.

2. Contracts ⊜206—Contract between parties, as to conduct of proposed litigation, in which both were interested, held not changed by acceptance thereof by attorneys.

Where parties, interested in proposed litigation to abate nuisance from overflowing their lands, and for damages, signed contract to pay specified portion of expenses, incurred in such litigation, acceptance of terms of employment therein by counsel did not alter instrument or change its nature.

3. Contracts ⊜245(2)—Written contract, providing for proportion of payment of expenses and costs incurred in proposed litigation, held to control oral negotiations or understanding.

Even if provision of contract by parties, interested in proposed litigation, that each party would pay certain proportion of costs and expenses incurred therein, was subject to understanding and agreement that it should not be final, but be subject to reapportionment at end of litigation, under Civ. Code, § 1625, written instrument controlled any oral negotiations or understandings occurring previously to execution thereof.

4. Corporations ⊜426(10)—Beginning action on contract by corporation held ratification thereof.

Under Civ. Code, § 1588, providing that contract, voidable for want of due consent, may be ratified by subsequent consent, and section 1589 making voluntary acceptance of benefit of transaction equivalent to consent to obligations arising therefrom, even if contract by corporation to pay certain proportion of proposed litigation, in which it was interested, was not binding on corporation, its beginning action against party to such contract to recover portion of costs and expenses incurred therein amounted to complete ratification.

5. Corporations ⊜426(10)—Action by corporation, under contract, held to prevent party thereto escaping liability on theory that corporation was not bound.

Where corporation and person, interested in litigation, contracted that each should pay certain proportion of costs and expenses incurred therein, and corporation at once started suit, as did person, in pursuance of terms and conditions of contract, and corporation expended moneys for costs and expenses and accepted benefits of agreement, it could not have denied liability under contract which it had ratified by performance, on theory that president of corporation was not authorized to bind it, in view of Civ. Code, § 1589, providing that voluntary acceptance of benefit of transaction is equivalent to consent to obligations arising therefrom.

6. Contribution ⊜4—Contribution held not appropriate action for breach of contract to pay specified part of costs and expenses of litigation.

Where parties, interested in proposed litigation, contracted to pay specified portions of costs and expenses incurred therein, and to commence and prosecute actions separately, and did not intend to have community of interest in result of any judgment, doctrine of contribution was not involved in action by one party against other for recovery of specified proportion of expenses and costs incurred in litigation, but action was founded on express contract, in view of Civ. Code, § 1432, limiting action for contribution to cases of joint, or joint and several, obligations.

7. Contribution ⊜4—Principle, on which right of contribution is founded, applies only where parties are under common burden of liability.

Principle of equity, on which right of contribution is founded, applies only where parties are under common burden of liability, and where they are severally bound for specific portion of debt as principals and one pays more than he is bound for, he is entitled to no contribution from other for such excess.

8. Contracts ⊜206—Party, contracting to pay specified portion of costs and expenses incurred in proposal litigation, not entitled to require proof of actual payment before being required to pay her share.

Where parties, interested in proposed litigation, contracted each to pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred therein, and on advice of attorneys, action by one party thereto was prosecuted in action by plaintiff in such action against other party to recover her proportionate share for costs and expenses incurred, defendant could not require proof of actual payment of such costs and expenses, before being required to pay her share, she becoming liable when expense was incurred.

9. Words and phrases, "incurred" and "incur" defined.

"Incurred" means to become liable for, or subject to, to render liable or subject to; "incur" means something beyond contract, something not embraced in the word "debt."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Incur.]

10. Action ⊜62—Party, defending action to repay expenditures, held not entitled to object to jurisdiction because plaintiff had not paid sufficient amount before suit.

Where party contracted each to pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred in proposed litigation, and other party thereto, after incurring costs in contemplated litigation, sued party on contract, defendant could not object that superior court had no jurisdiction because plaintiff had not paid sufficient amount at time of suit to confer jurisdiction thereon.

11. Contracts ⊜56—Promise to pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred in certain case held sufficient consideration for promise of other party thereto to pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred in another case.

Contract of corporation, interested with other party in proposed litigation, that it would pay certain proportion of expenses and costs incurred in case of such other party against certain defendants, was sufficient consideration for promise of other party to contract that it would pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred in action by corporation.

12. Contracts ⊜206—Contract held not to require one of parties to defray all costs and expenses incurred in trial and appeal of either case referred to therein.

Contract between corporation and person, interested in proposed litigation, that each should pay specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred therein, and that they should pay such amount in specified proportion in each action of corporation against certain defendants and in case of the person against certain defendants, did not require one of parties thereto to defray all costs and expenses incurred in trial and appeal of either case, although separate cases by each party were contemplated.

13. Limitation of actions ⇐27 — Action on written contract held not barred by two-year limitation.

Action on written contract by party thereto to recover specified proportion of costs and expenses incurred in certain litigation was not subject to Code Civ. Proc. § 339, requiring action on contract, not founded on written instrument, to be brought within two years especially in view of fact that action was brought within three months from time total costs and expenses of litigation were ascertained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Weinberg Company against Rosa Heller on a contract. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James, Pace & Smith, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The subject of this action consists of an alleged obligation of the appellant to pay one-half of all expenses incurred in the preparation, trial, and appeal of a suit for injunction and damages, instituted by said corporation. A concise statement of the relations of the above-named parties, and the subject-matter of the former suit, are best presented by the language of a contract in writing, denominated "Agreement of Employment," dated November 22, 1915, which forms the basis of this proceeding. We therefore quote therefrom the provisions which are essential to a determination of the questions here involved, as follows:

"That whereas, the undersigned is interested in certain lands lying southeast of the Los Angeles river (also known as the San Gabriel river), within and near the limits of the city of Long Beach, all in the county of Los Angeles; * * *

"Whereas, the undersigned has sustained loss and damage to his said lands referred to above by reason of the diversion and overflow of waters of said river from and out of its natural course; and

"Whereas, the undersigned claims damages growing out of the same; and

"Whereas, the undersigned has determined to institute proceedings in court against the parties responsible for the diversion of said waters, and for the recovery of damages therefor, and also to abate the nuisance as an incident to such action for damages, and to pursue any and all other necessary courses at law:

"Now, therefore, the undersigned hereby employs [certain firms of lawyers named, for the purpose above specified, upon conditions and for a contingent compensation specified in detail].

"It is agreed, that the undersigned shall not be required to advance or pay any cost or expense incurred by said attorneys, except that the Weinberg Company, a corporation, shall advance and pay eight-fifteenths (8/15ths), and that Rosa Heller shall advance and pay seven-fifteenths (7/15ths) of all the costs of court incurred in this action, including court costs, reporters' fees, jury fees, and costs of appeal; and said Weinberg Company, a corporation, and Rosa Heller shall pay said amount in said portions in each action of the Weinberg Company against George Bixby or George Bixby and/or other defendants and in the case of Rosa Heller against George Bixby or George Bixby and/or other defendants.

"It is agreed, that said attorneys shall commence action or actions to abate said nuisance and/or recover said damages as soon as reasonably possible after the signing of this agreement and shall prosecute said actions with reasonable diligence until they shall have been finally disposed of in any court to which the same may be carried by any party thereto; provided further that it shall be discretionary with the said attorneys whether or not they shall institute or conduct any proceedings on appeal on behalf of the undersigned in any action commenced herein. * * *

"In witness whereof, the parties hereto set their hands and seals this 22d day of November, 1915.

"[Signed] The Weinberg Co.,
"By I. Weinberg, Pres.
"Rosa Heller.

"We hereby accept the above terms of employment.

"[Signed] Vietch & Richardson,
"Andrews, Toland & Andrews."

Thereafter an action was commenced by the Weinberg Company against the Pacific Electric Railway Company and others for the damages mentioned in the agreement, in the sum of $80,000, and a like suit was instituted in the name of Rosa Heller, against the same defendants, for damages in the sum of $70,000. After issue joined in each suit, there was some discussion by the attorneys whom Weinberg and Mrs. Heller had by said contract agreed to employ, with counsel for the defendants in said suits, and with the above-named contracting parties, plaintiff and respondent, and defendant and appellant herein, regarding efforts to persuade the defendants' counsel to consolidate them, and upon the advice of a civil engineer as to the expediency of trying the Weinberg Case first, the latter was set for trial. It appears that Weinberg and Mrs. Heller were advised by their counsel that in the event of success in the trial of one case they could probably negotiate a settlement of the other, but failing in this they might more easily prosecute the same to judgment; that the Weinberg Case was considered as involving all the facts, was the best case to try first, and a final decision therein would be determinative of the Heller Case.

The action filed by the Weinberg Company was, therefore, by consent of all parties tried, and a judgment was rendered in the superior court in favor of the plaintiff therein against all the defendants except the Pacific Electric Railway Company, for the sum of $40,000; the railway company receiving a judgment against Weinberg for costs. Practically all the plaintiff's costs and expenses of the trial were paid by the respective parties to this appeal, in the proportions specified in said contract. Appeal from such judgment was thereupon taken to the Supreme Court by the defendants against whom it was rendered, and was reversed. Weinberg Co. v. Bixby, 185 Cal. 87, 196 P. 25. The action was not retried, nor was the case of Heller v. Bixby et al. ever brought to trial.

Following said reversal, Weinberg, acting on behalf of his corporation, demanded that Mrs. Heller pay the sum of $2,025.08, which was seven-fifteenths of the costs and expenses incurred upon appeal, including judgments for costs obtained by the several defendants, and a portion of the expenses of the original trial, which remained unpaid. Appellant declined to pay any portion of the amount demanded, and the respondent thereupon instituted this action, wherein he received a judgment for $1,979.75.

There is no dispute as to the parties having executed the agreement, nor that the costs and expenses were incurred as alleged in the complaint herein. A number of grounds have been advanced as a defense, however, principal of which are, (1) that there were no contractual obligations between the Weinberg Company and Rosa Heller; that the signed agreement was no more than a simultaneous agreement to employ the same attorneys; that appellant did not agree to pay any costs except such as should be incurred by their attorneys; (2) that the sole consideration for the agreement as to any division of costs incurred by said attorneys was a further agreement that the two cases should be consolidated and tried together, and that the proportionate responsibilities of the plaintiffs therein were but tentatively fixed as a basis of the written contract of employment, and were subject to certain reapportionment at the termination of the litigation; (3) that, since the cases were not consolidated, the defendant herein was relieved from any obligation which she may have assumed as to payment of costs.

[1] In the first place, we think appellant is incorrect in the contention that there was no contractual obligation between the Weinberg Company and Rosa Heller. In this connection, appellant devotes quite extensive argument and quotation from authorities to an attempted application of well-established principles of law to a construction of the agreement which assumes that the transaction was a joint undertaking, for the prosecution of a single action, or the pursuit of a common cause. She insists that she did not contract with Weinberg, but jointly with him employed the attorneys named, and that her legal obligation, if any, was only to pay them, and that if Weinberg may have paid the whole amount, he might seek a contribution, and hence that this action upon the contract is without foundation.

[2] This position is novel, but not tenable. Appellant signed the contract with Weinberg, expressly promising to pay seven-fifteenths of the costs and expenses incurred in the Weinberg Case "including court costs, reporters' fees, jury fees, witness fees, and costs of appeal." The contract specifically fixes the proportion of all costs and expenses which Rosa Heller agreed to pay when incurred in the trial and appeal of the Weinberg Case. The costs and expenses were concededly incurred, and she paid her proportionate share of many items during the trial, which stamped the contract with her approval and partial performance, and, when hope for success vanished, she denied further liability for costs and expenses incurred, contending that Weinberg had agreed to have both cases tried together, and sought to vary the express provisions of the written instrument. It is not contended that fraud was practiced upon her, or that there was any mutual misunderstanding of the contract which would warrant its cancellation or modification; and it is plainly obvious that the instrument is silent as to consolidation. It clearly provides that she shall pay seven-fifteenths of all court costs and expenses incurred in each case by said attorneys; the attorneys incurred costs and expenses in one case, the result of which obviated the necessity for further costs or expenses in the other case. Separate suits are provided for by the contract, and the actions were in fact separately instituted. There is no claim that the interests of Weinberg and Mrs. Heller were in common, nor was the same land affected; and it was not contemplated that either of the plaintiffs should share in the proceeds of any judgment which might be obtained by the other. The contract outlined shows it to contain first a recital of the conditions giving rise to certain anticipated litigation; then, the terms upon which counsel shall be employed; and next, the provisions here in controversy, beginning with the words, "It is agreed," and which have to do with the payment of certain costs and expenses by the respective parties. The instrument is signed by both parties. Thereafter appears an acceptance of the terms of employment, signed by counsel. This addendum amounts to nothing more than an approval and consent on the part of counsel to act in accordance with the terms and provisions of the contract, as agreed between the parties. Had this acceptance been omitted, appellant's construction of the contract would have been impossible. Yet, it cannot be said that this addition had the effect of altering the instrument and changing its nature.

[3] One of appellant's contentions is that the provision of the contract by which the Weinberg Company stipulated that it would pay eight-fifteenths, and Mrs. Heller agreed to pay seven-fifteenths, of the enumerated expenses incurred, was understood by the parties to furnish only a tentative arrangement, and that the proportions to be borne by the parties were to be rearranged. The second answer of the defendant contained an allegation to this general effect, which the court found to be true. This allegation is that there was an express "understanding and agreement that such contract should not be final, but subject to reapportionment at the end of the litigation in the ratio that the recoveries of the respective parties should bear to each share." The obvious reply to this defense is that the contract clearly contemplated that the parties should pay in the ratio of eight-fifteenths and seven-fifteenths as expenses were incurred. It is immaterial that a further oral agreement for contingent reapportionment was made before the written agreement was executed. This instrument contains no reference to reapportionment. Appellant did not plead fraud or mistake. If there were any oral negotiations or understandings occurring previously to the execution of the written instrument, they were merged therein. Civ. Code, § 1625.

[4, 5] It is also asserted that the evidence failed to sustain the finding that Weinberg was authorized to bind the corporation, and that the plaintiff was not therefore obligated to appellant by such instrument, and the contract was not mutual, since had Mrs. Heller instituted an action against the corporation, it could have denied the authority of Weinberg to sign the name of the Weinberg Company. The citation of authority is hardly necessary to the disposal of this point in her argument. Section 1588 of the Civil Code provides that:

"A contract which is voidable solely for want of due consent, may be ratified by a subsequent consent."

The beginning of the present action was in itself a complete ratification of the contract, which forms the basis of this controversy. Again, section 1589 of the same Code provides that:

"A voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, so far as the facts are known, or ought to be known, to the person accepting."

The respondent corporation at once started suit, as did appellant, in pursuance of the terms and conditions of said contract; it expended moneys for the costs and expenses which are the subject of this action, thus performing the conditions, and accepting the benefits, of the agreement. It could not, therefore, have denied liability under the provisions of the contract which it had fully ratified by performance.

[6] In support of her claim that the facts furnished grounds for no other action than one of contribution, appellant cites authorities applying to facts constituting a combined interest of the parties to the litigation. Huston v. Fisk, 10 La. Ann. 769, is representative, and is decided upon sound principles of law, but it did not involve variant and several interests, or disunited properties. The plaintiffs and defendants were proprietors of a property from which they had been threatened with eviction. They agreed to contribute proportionately to their respective interests in the property, for the purpose of prosecuting a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. It was agreed by the parties that a fund of $4,000 be thus provided, which the defendants failed to assist in assembling, for the defense of the litigation. The plaintiffs paid all of the expenses, and sued the defendants for the proportionate share, which they had agreed to pay. The Supreme Court of Louisiana, in affirming a judgment against the latter said:

"They chose to employ other counsel than those already employed by all the proprietors, for the purpose of remedying the mischief occasioned by their own laches or bad faith. The payment of such counsel was their own affair. They might have paid their share when it was due, and gone to Mr. Pierce to prosecute their writ of error, without any additional expense. But because, by their own act, they incurred an additional charge, we cannot relieve them from the obligation of their contract to pay their quota towards the expenses which accrued under the joint resolutions for the joint benefit, and of which the defendants have reaped the profits, in common with their coproprietors."

The facts before us, in the case at bar, do not permit a holding that contribution would have been the appropriate action. A single writ of error, for the joint benefit of all the contracting parties, was contemplated in the case quoted, whereas, in the instant case, the parties contracted to commence and prosecute actions, not of coproprietors, co-owners, or coplaintiffs. There was no joint interest, or joint action, or community of interest in the result of any judgment intended. In Security Insurance Co. v. St. Paul F. & M. Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 233, an agreement was signed by several insurance companies which created a joint liability, each agreeing to contribute in proportion to their respective interests for the defense of a claim for loss. They appointed a committee to manage the defense, with full power to incur all necessary expenses. The plaintiff, one of said companies, was afterwards sued by an employee of such committee, for his services in the original action, and recovered judgment for the full amount demanded. Said plaintiff thereupon brought suit against its cocontractors for contribution, and it was held that the latter, though not joined in the action of the employee, were at liberty to have joined in an effort to defeat it, had they seen fit to do so; but that the claim had been approved by the committee, and that the plaintiff could safely have paid it without waiting to be sued. It therefore at once becomes apparent that the employee could have prosecuted his action against either one or all of the contracting parties, whereas, in the case at bar, Mrs. Heller, under her contract, was liable to no one but Weinberg for expenses incurred in prosecuting his action against Bixby et al. It was agreed that she should "advance and pay" her seven-fifteenths of the costs and expenses incurred; Weinberg incurred them, but she failed to pay her share. He testified that the reason for such provision was that he did not have the means with which to pay the entire expense contemplated when the agreement was made. The doctrine of contribution is not involved in the facts of this case. Plaintiff's right of action, if any it has, does not arise out of the theory of contribution, but is founded upon defendant's express contract to pay seven-fifteenths of the court costs and other expenses mentioned. It does not arise out of any implied contract, as in the case of contribution. If the corporation became individually liable for all of the court costs and expenses of the litigation, it is not because of any contractual obligation arising out of this contract. It is because, and only because, it was the sole party plaintiff and the sole losing party in the action in which the costs and expenses were incurred; that is, it was the sole losing party after the decision of the Supreme Court.

"A party to a joint, or joint and several obligations, who satisfies more than his share of the claim against all, may require a proportionate contribution from all the parties joined with him." Civ. Code, § 1432.

[7] The obligation must be joint, or joint and several. In the contract under consideration there was no joint contract of Weinberg and Heller with any one. If Weinberg and Mrs. Heller, jointly, or jointly and severally, had agreed with some third person to compensate him, each would then be liable to such party for the whole amount, and if one paid all, he might seek contribution from the other. The principle of equity, on which the right of contribution is founded, applies only where the parties are under a common burden of liability. Where the parties are severally bound for a specific portion of a debt, as principals, and one pays more than he is bound for, he is entitled to no contribution from the other for such excess. 13 Corp. Jur. p. 82, and cases cited in note 20, viz.: Los Angeles Nat. Bank v. Vance, 9 Cal. App. 57, 98 P. 58; McArthur v. Board, 119 Iowa, 562, 93 N. W. 580; Briggs v. Barnett, 108 Va. 404, 61 S. E. 797.

[8, 9] Nor could appellant require proof of actual payment by respondent before she should "advance and pay" her share; when the expense was incurred, Weinberg became liable therefor, and by the terms of the contract seven-fifteenths thereof then became due from the appellant. The legal definition of the term to "incur" has been announced in many decisions in various jurisdictions. The Supreme Court of Oklahoma, in Bank v. Eckles, 19 Okl. 159, 91 P. 695, said:

"The word 'incurred' is defined by Webster as 'to become liable or subject to; to render liable or subject to.' Black says: 'Men contract debts. They incur liabilities. In the one case, they act affirmatively; in the other, the liability is incurred or cast upon them by operation of law. "Incur" means something beyond contracts, something not embraced in the word "debt."' In Scott v. Tyler, 14 Barb. (N. Y.) 202, 'incur' is held to mean 'to become liable for.' Flanagan v. Baltimore & O. R. Co., 83 Iowa, 639, 50 N. W. 60: 'To become liable for.' In Beekman v. Van Dolsen [70 Hun, 288] 24 N. Y. S. 414: 'To become liable for.' In Deyo v. Stewart, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 101: 'Brought on himself.' In Ashe v. Young, 68 Tex. 123, 3 S. W. 454: 'Brought on, occasioned, or caused.'"

In re McElheny, 91 App. Div. 131, 86 N. Y. S. 326, held that the provision, "The above note is left as collateral security for all liabilities incurred," should be construed as intending to cover an indebtedness brought into existence, and that "a lien attached in their favor * * * when such indebtedness existed and was due." And in Beekman v. Van Dolsen, 70 Hun, 288, 24 N. Y. S. 414, which involved a contract containing the provision: "We hold ourselves responsible for any cost or damage which may be incurred by said Van Dolsen in treating said Thompson according to law as a trespasser," it was said:

"It is urged that the law is settled in this state that, where the guaranty is against any liability, then the costs and legal damages which may have been incurred may be recovered, but where the contract is a guaranty against damage or a guaranty against loss, actual damage or actual loss must be shown before a recovery can be had. But it seems to us that, applying the rule above claimed, the point urged is not well taken. The guaranty is not against damage which may be suffered, but against cost and damage which may be incurred. 'Suffered' means 'paid,' 'incurred' means 'become liable for.' The language is, 'we hold ourselves responsible for any costs and damages which may be incurred by said Van Dolsen,' not 'which he may suffer;' and the purport of the language is the same as though it read 'which he may become liable for,' because the incurring of a liability does not necessarily mean that such liability has been paid."

[10] Appellant makes the point in the instant case that, should she be held liable for her portion of the costs and expenses incurred by respondent, he had not actually paid a sufficient amount thereof at the time his suit was commenced against her to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court, and that his action was therefore premature. However, as indicated, the respondent incurred costs and expenses in fulfillment of his part of the contract; he brought them upon himself, and became liable for them, and at that moment appellant became liable under the express provisions of her contract for the portion which she agreed to pay when incurred. It was not contemplated by the parties, nor was it agreed, that appellant should be liable only after respondent could show actual payment which the contract was, in part at least, intended to avoid.

[11, 12] An element of the defense which appellant contends establishes her right to a reversal upon this appeal is that there was no consideration for the promise which the respondent seeks to enforce. However, the Weinberg Company reciprocally obligated itself to pay eight-fifteenths of all costs and expenses which might be incurred in "the case of Rosa Heller against George Bixby or against George Bixby and/or other defendants." It appears that appellant's rights were adjudicated at about one-half the cost of litigating one of the cases, and that it was originally understood that a victory in one case would doubtless obviate the necessity for a trial of the other. Weinberg testified that his corporation could not have maintained the expense alone, and that such was not the intention of either party at the time the contract was signed; nor do we think the language of the instrument in question is susceptible of a construction which would require one of the parties to defray all the costs and expenses incurred in the trial and appeal of either case. The successful termination of one of the suits was not made a contingency as to the obligation of the parties to the contract; and, this being true, it cannot be said that an adverse decision would relieve them therefrom.

[13] Again, it is contended that the action was barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, not founded upon an instrument in writing, must be brought within two years. This action being, as we have shown, founded upon an obligation arising from an instrument in writing, the point is not tenable. Weinberg v. Bixby, supra, was reversed March 26, 1921, and the complaint herein was filed June 6, 1921, within about three months from the time the total costs and expenses were ascertained.

No other points appear worthy of discussion, and, no error having been shown, the judgment is affirmed.

Evidence held to show last will of testatrix expressed her wishes.

2. Wills ⇐155(1)—What constitutes "undue influence" stated.

In order to establish that a will has been executed under "undue influence," it is not only necessary to show that such influence has been exercised, but that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator by which the will which he executes is not an expression of his own desires, constraining him to make a disposition of his property contrary to that he would have made if permitted to follow his own inclination or judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

3. Wills ⇐155(4) — Kindness and consideration shown testatrix by husband and beneficiary cannot be considered as undue influence impeaching testatrix's will.

Kindness and consideration shown testatrix by husband and beneficiary cannot be considered as undue influence impeaching testatrix's will.

4. Wills ⇐155(1)—Prejudice or aversion of testatrix for some of natural objects of bounty does not constitute undue influence, though will is clearly fruit of resentment or dislike.

Prejudice or aversion of testatrix for some of natural objects of bounty does not constitute undue influence, though will is clearly fruit of resentment or dislike.

5. Wills ⇐55(1) — Evidence of what took place at execution of will held to irresistibly show that testatrix was able and free to execute same.

In view of testimony of attorney who drew will and doctor and nurse who attended testatrix, held, that evidence as to what took place at execution of will irresistibly showed that testatrix was able to make a will and was, at the time, free to act in executing same.

6. Wills ⇐166(12)—Testatrix's change of attorney held to have no bearing on question of validity of will.

In a will contest on the ground of undue influence, where it was shown that will was drawn by a different attorney than usually employed by testatrix, held, that such circumstance had no bearing on question of will's validity.

7. Wills ⇐166(12)—Undue influence may be established by circumstantial evidence, but such evidence must do more than raise suspicion.

Undue influence may be established by circumstantial evidence, but such evidence must do more than raise a suspicion and must amount to proof, and has force or proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that will was spontaneous act of alleged testator.

8. Wills ⇐158, 159, 166(5)—Undue influence must destroy free agency of testator at time of making testament.

Undue influence to avoid a will must destroy the free agency of the testator at the time and in the very act of making the will and must bear directly upon the testamentary act, and fact that a testator makes a foolish, unnatural, or unjust will does not show undue influence.

9. Evidence ⇐568(2)—Opinion of witness as to testatrix's capacity can be of no more weight than reasons upon which based.

The opinion of a witness that a person is of unsound mind can be no stronger than or of superior evidentiary weight to reasons on which he bases his opinion.

10. Wills ⇐45—Law permits wills to be made on deathbed, and duty devolves upon courts to give effect to and protect such wills.

The law permits will to be made on deathbed of testator, and a duty devolves upon the courts to give effect to every safeguard the law has provided to protect the will, if it appears to be the true will, and to see that it stands, though made in some degree of weakness.

11. Wills ⇐163(2)—No presumption against validity of will on ground of undue influence from relation of husband and wife.

No presumption against the validity of a will upon the ground of undue influence will be permitted to be indulged in this state from the relation of husband and wife.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Laura Jane Carson, deceased. From a judgment in favor of Emma Jeannette Chase, as contestant of deceased's will, Lawrence E. Carson, as proponent, appeals. Reversed.

T. W. Chester and Lee Gebhart, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

H. W. Zagoren, Markham Johnston, and Howe, Hibbitt & Johnston, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

ANDERSON, Justice pro tem. Laura Jane Carson of Sacramento county died testate on or about the 8th day of February, 1923, leaving her, surviving, Lawrence E. Carson, a husband, and Mrs. Emma Jane Chase, a daughter. Deceased was 80 years of age past. Her will was executed February 1, 1923, while she was ill with pneumonia. In this will Lawrence E. Carson, her husband, was named executor, a legacy of $10 was left to Emma J. Chase, a daughter, a legacy of $500 to Carrie Johnson, a niece, and the residue was left to the husband. The estimated value of the estate was about $7,000. She had several months before, conveyed other property to the husband. The validity of the will was contested by Mrs. Emma J. Chase, the daughter. The grounds of contest were unsoundness of mind and undue influence. The undue influence was alleged to have been exercised by the husband, Lawrence E. Carson. The case was twice tried by the court, sitting with a jury, and upon each trial the court refused to submit the question of unsoundness of mind to the jury. On the second trial the jury rendered a verdict in favor of the contestant on the question of undue influence.

The contention of appellant is that the verdict of the jury is not substantially supported, or supported at all, by evidence, and that the question of undue influence should not have been submitted to the jury. It is also contended that the court erred in permitting a nonexpert witness to express an opinion on the question of unsoundness of mind, particularly as the court had, at the first trial, granted a nonsuit on the question of unsoundness of mind and no appeal had been taken therefrom.

It will be necessary to refer to the evidence to determine as a matter of law whether the evidence substantially and fairly supports the verdict of undue influence. It seems that the contestant's mother and father separated (whether or not they were divorced does not appear) about the year 1910. The exact time is unimportant. Before the separation they were living in a home which the mother had built (the evidence is not clear as to whether or not this was the mother's separate property before marriage). The mother continued to live in this house until her death. After the separation the father lived a few years in Sacramento in a separate residence and the daughter lived with the mother. Thereafter the father moved to Los Angeles and in a few years the daughter went to Los Angeles to live with the father. This residence continued for a duration of about 16 years, until the father's death. The father accumulated apparently $12,000 worth of property, several thousand of which were used by him in his last sickness, according to the testimony of the daughter. The balance was given to the daughter. During this period of 16 years the daughter visited the mother once. After the death of the father the daughter returned to live with the mother and continued to live with her until August

4, 1922. The daughter's maiden name was Burke. It does not appear when she was married. It appears from the evidence that it was the father's desire that the daughter should keep the property he gave her for herself, and, if there was anything left, it should be given to orphan children. The daughter testified that she told her mother this. She testified in her deposition first taken to that effect, and at the trial testified that she told her mother when "we" are through with it, it is to go to the orphans. There is testimony in the record to the effect that the mother had said that as the daughter, Mrs. Chase, was going to follow the father's wishes and the daughter did not intend to give the mother any of her property, she would see that the daughter received none of hers. There is also much evidence in the record to the effect that the mother was fearful that the daughter was trying to get the mother's property so that it might be given to the church. This seems to have worried the mother much, and immediately after the will was made she remarked to the nurse: "I can rest easy now, the minister, Rev. Bartlan, and the rest of them cannot spend my money." She made other declarations that the daughter spent too much money in the church, and she also told many people that she was usually left alone; the daughter was not much company to her as she practically lived in the church. The daughter admitted she spent much of her time with the church. This is corroborated by the Rev. Bartlan:

"Q. Did she frequently attend every night in the week? A. Yes; I think I can say yes.

"Q. In regard to the daytime; did she have occasion to visit your church in the daytime? A. Once or twice a week she might come up there for services in the church.

"Q. Did she have any particular duties or any services she performed there? A. Yes; she had.

"Q. The question was, What were the usual hours that she was in attendance, had any activity with the church? A. At night.

"Q. At night? A. It would vary from 10:30 to 11:30, perhaps later, sometimes later."

We quote further to show the influence the minister had with the said daughter:

"Q. What did she say in regard to leaving Sacramento prior to August? A. Well, she asked me whether it would be advisable for her to leave Sacramento, detailing the circumstances of her environment at her home.

"Q. And you told her what? A. I advised her to leave, at least temporarily.

"Q. Did Mrs. Chase go to Oakland? A. Yes.

"Q. And do you know when she returned? A. About a week after her mother's death."

When the trouble occurred between Mr. Carson and Mrs. Carson, as will appear further on, because Mr. Carson went away about August 1, 1922, it seems that the Rev. Bartlan was present with the mother and daughter on the way to Attorney Dunn's office, apparently to talk about the divorce matter.

About the month of February, 1921, Lawrence E. Carson, the proponent, went to work at the home of Laura Jane Burke at Thirtieth and B streets, Sacramento. Soon thereafter he was given a room, and he did garden work a short time. Prior to this he had been discharged, it seems honorably, from the United States army; this was his second enlistment. It will be necessary to refer to this again. There is some dispute as to his age, and we deem it fair to say it was slightly upwards of 50 years, while Mrs. Burke's age was slightly upwards of 80 years. This acquaintanceship grew into a marriage at Marysville November 7, 1921. After the marriage they lived at the old home residence of Mrs. Carson, together with her daughter. Then came the old story of the child objecting to a parent marrying a younger person or any one else. The evidence reveals the attitude of some of the neighbors sympathizing with the daughter by reason of the marriage; some of them refused to visit Mrs. Carson. This trouble between Mr. and Mrs. Carson occurred early in August, 1922, when Mr. Carson went to the southern part of the state to see his daughter by a former marriage. He did not inform his wife that he was going away at the time he left. The evidence, and a fair inference therefrom, reveal that something occurred which entirely turned Mrs. Carson against her husband. Attorneys were consulted, divorce was discussed, ministers of the Gospel apparently appealed to, banks were visited, safe deposit boxes were searched, the husband was accused of taking valuable documents away, etc. At about the time the fever of excitement was highest, the husband returned. The explanation of the husband seemed to satisfy the wife; but the daughter, about the 4th day of August, 1922, very clandestinely left the city and did everything she could thereafter to conceal her whereabouts from her mother, and never again, it seems, tried to see her mother, although she was in Sacramento a month before the mother's death and was further notified of her mother's last illness, which notice she admitted receiving.

It is at least insinuated by the contestant that Carson was not the right man for Mrs. Carson to marry; that he was too young, etc. This could be said more effectively in Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 198 P. 407, and many other cases. Every case of the kind depends largely upon circumstances. Carson may be called a gambler because he had something to do with cards upon a certain occasion. He may be considered not thrifty because he did not own much of this world's possessions, but one fact stands out all through the testimony, that he was always willing to work and did work. This naturally appealed to Mrs. Carson, as she, it seems, had worked hard all her life, and it is a matter of common experience that people who have worked hard for a living do have much respect for people who perform manual labor. If he did not have much means it must be borne in mind that many years of his life were spent in the army and every one knows that the government does not pay very much. He did well to save what he did from his last enlistment. He claimed to have deposited several hundred dollars in a well-known San Francisco bank at a certain time. Contestant seemed to doubt this. If Carson was not telling the truth about this, there was ample time to impeach his statement by evidence that would be indisputable, but this was not done and it might have been important for contestant if it could have been done. He met Mrs. Carson shortly after he left the army at the conclusion of the world war. At that time enthusiasm for the soldier had not yet subsided, as it sometimes unfortunately does in time, and so Mrs. Carson may have been very proud to claim, as we might say, an old soldier for a companion. There may have been other reasons why she might have liked him, although others might not, but we have no concern with that. There is, however, abundant evidence in the record to show that he was kind to her. He even did much of the housework, and this while performing his daily garden work for others, and he seems always to have been at home at night with her. Many witnesses testified that Mrs. Carson often declared that her life had been made happy and her work and duties much easier after her marriage to Mr. Carson and that she wished she had met him long before she did. Much of the record is taken up with testimony in relation to what his earnings were before and after the marriage, and about the placing of the husband's name in certain instruments and not putting it in others, etc., and putting it on and taking it off of safe deposit boxes. The most of the matters in relation to this occurred about the time the trouble happened in August, 1922, and we think it shows that Mrs. Carson had strength of mind sufficient to do as she pleased and expressed herself with considerable firmness even, according to the daughter's testimony. It seems that Mr. Carson had nothing to do about putting his name in the Hartman mortgage, one of the instruments, it appears, he was accused of having taken away with him at the time of his absence. Mr. Hartman, the mortgagor, explained this quite fully. Mr. Carson seems to have had but little education and practically no business knowledge. He probably did think that if the home should be placed in his name, he being a discharged soldier, they would escape the taxes. Another matter which is much stressed is: The daughter stated that Mr. Carson urged the testatrix to deed her home to him in order to escape payment of taxes, he being an ex-soldier, and that when the testatrix refused "he told her he would go down and see Judge Glenn and have her declared incompetent and * * * get it that way." Mr. Carson denied this, but testified:

"I told her that Mrs. Chase had run away with her money and her securities. * * * I told her I would go before the superior court, if she wanted me to, and have the public administrator take care of her affairs. She told me, 'No, rather I attend to her affairs.'"

He said he thought this would be a relief to Mrs. Carson as she was at that time so nervous, no doubt on account of the quarrels between the daughter and husband. Had it been his intention to do this, surely he was not then trying to exert undue influence upon Mrs. Carson, because such an act probably would have entirely destroyed the possible results of the undue influence, had any been attempted. He may have said, "Jennie is crazy," referring to Mrs. Chase, but he had a right to his own opinion, and this was merely opinion. However, according to the mother, the daughter, Jennie, was "peculiar" and had "spells," but statements by the husband against the daughter, if the mother had any great affection for her, would only tend to make the mother cling more closely to her daughter out of pity for her, thus defeating the effect of any purpose that may have been intended. This feature is revealed and commented upon in Estate of Bryson, 191 Cal. 521, 217 P. 525, and in other cases.

At least three reasons appear why the daughter was not provided for in the will, any one of which might have been sufficient to produce the terms of the will: First, it appears from the testimony that Mrs. Chase told her mother what her father told her she should do with the property he had given her (Mrs. Chase). It does not appear what occasioned the separation between the father and mother, but it seemed to be sufficiently strong to last until death. No doubt the mother reasoned that the daughter cared more for the father than she did for the mother, as she seemed to adhere so steadfastly to his wishes, and it is not hard to believe that she declared, in effect, that—

"Jennie shall not have any of my property, as she does not intend to give me any of hers."

The second reason is that she no doubt encouraged her mother to believe Mr. Carson took her papers away and that he probably had no intention of returning, and she no doubt did what she could to turn the mother against him, and when the husband returned and explained everything, apparently to the satisfaction of the mother Mrs. Carson probably then felt her husband had been wronged. This, no doubt, intensified her feeling for Carson, if anything was lacking before. Our Supreme Court, in Estate of Wilson, 117 Cal. at page 279, 49 P. 172, 177, comment upon the effect of such a reconciliation:

"But during her last sickness, and after she had made the will of February 27th, her husband frequently went to see her, and they were often together alone; and it was quite natural that under these circumstances, her animosity to him should soften, as it evidently did."

It was but natural for the mother then to criticize the daughter, probably charging her with trying to cause her to divorce her husband, which the daughter resented by leaving. If any hope still remained for her to be the recipient of her mother's bounty, in the face of the last two reasons against her, she must have destroyed every vestige of chance by concealing her whereabouts and permitting only the minister, Rev. Bartlan, to know where she was, the minister refusing to tell the mother at all because the daughter had warned him not to, thus aggravating an already very tender grievance with the mother, caused by the daughter paying too much heed to the minister's advice. Naturally this would influence the mother more against both the minister and the daughter, and she gave expression to these feelings at the time she made the will, as before quoted, but the effect of this conduct was augmented and reinforced by what must have appeared to the mother as nothing less than cruelty when, in her last sickness, she had a telegram sent to the daughter stating she was very ill and asking her to come; the daughter receiving the message, but making no reply. The telegram was sent about 7 days before the mother died, and the daughter could have responded in person in less than 24 hours, or, had she been ill, as claimed, she could have afforded her mother the consolation of a message in recognition of the telegram. This might have, even at this late date, caused the mother to redraft the will. The mother died February 8th. About a week after the mother was buried, the daughter returned to Sacramento, according to Rev. Bartlan's testimony.

[1, 2] With these reasons before us, we cannot say that the will does not express the wishes of the testatrix, and upon this we quote from Estate of Bryson, 191 Cal. at page 541, 217 P. 525, 533:

"'In order to establish that a will has been executed under undue influence, it is necessary to show, not only that such influence has been exercised, but also that it has produced an effect upon the mind of the testator by which the will which he executes is not the expression of his own desires' (Estate of Calkins, 112 Cal. 296, 44 P. 577), * * * constraining him to make a disposition of his property contrary to and different from what he would have done had he been permitted to follow his own inclination or judgment (Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 11, 120 P. 762)."

The daughter stated, in explanation of her failure to answer the telegram, that she thought the telegram was sent as a hoax to induce her to come home, and also that she was ill at the time the telegram was read to her. The daughter may have been actuated by what she considered the best of motives by refusing to see and concealing herself from her mother, but that does not soften the harshness of her conduct as it must have appeared unexplained to the mother, and we can only consider what would be the usual effect of her conduct upon the mother, and we feel that this would be the same whether the mother was strong or weak, sick or well, but the effect probably would have been aggravated had she been, as the daughter claimed, sick and weak. We find no place in the testimony where Mr. Carson tried to keep the daughter from visiting the mother when Mrs. Chase was in Sacramento in January, 1923, or at any other time before the mother was taken ill. In the letter Mrs. Schardin wrote about the 1st of January, 1923, Mrs. Carson had her write Jennie that she would not make her any trouble if she would return the papers, and told her to tell her also that she had deeded the home place to Mr. Carson. The daughter did not answer the letter, but apparently received it, as about January 8th she came to Sacramento and returned the papers. In regard to the papers, the following occurred in the testimony of Rev. Bartlan:

"Q. Did she inform you at any time prior to her departure in August, 1922, about having papers and moneys, etc., belonging to Mrs. Carson? A. I doubt it very much; I don't remember.

"Q. Will you say she did not? A. I cannot be pinned down; I do not remember."

Rev. Bartlan also testified in regard to the papers of Mrs. Carson:

"Q. Will you state what was said by her and by yourself at that time regarding the disposition of the papers? A. I told her I was glad she came back and had restored the papers."

When Mrs. Carson had Mrs. Schardin state in the letter to the daughter that she had deeded the home place to the husband, this put Mrs. Chase on notice so she could have interviewed the mother when she came to Sacramento on this January trip and she could have ascertained then, if she desired, if Mr. Carson had used any undue influence or force to procure the deed, and, if justified, she thus would have had the mother's assistance to prove the undue influence, if any had been exerted; but she did not attempt to go near her mother for any purpose.

[3] Instead of the will being an unnatural will, it is only a fair illustration of the ordinary display of the operation of natural resentment by a parent of real or fancied wrongs. The cases are full of instances where the reasons for the resentment were more indirect and more trifling as compared with the reasons here shown and no doubt were the turning point against the child, and in some cases the beneficiary disgustingly encouraged the resentment. We refer to one case cited by our Supreme Court in the Estate of Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 49 P. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179, being Clapp v. Fullerton, 34 N. Y. 190, 90 Am. Dec. 681. Mrs. Carson may not have reasoned like a philosopher, but it cannot be said that she did not reason as a majority of people would when angered, as she probably was, about the daughter's intention as to the disposition of her own property and at the way her daughter left her and apparently ignored her wishes to the last. Common experience teaches us that a child, or any one else, expecting to be the recipient of the bounty of others, who gives cause for anger and resentment, does so at his peril. If, then, Carson took the other course, and by being kind and considerate thereby gained the testatrix's affections and bounty, it was legitimate, and we must permit it to have its proper effect. The Supreme Court in the Estate of Donovan, 140 Cal. pp. 394 and 395, 73 P. 1081, 1082, quoting with approval a decision in another jurisdiction, speaking of the effect of kindness, etc., say:

"'If a wife by her virtues had gained such an ascendency over her husband, and so riveted his affections that her good pleasure is a law to him, such an influence can never be reason for impeaching a will made in her favor, even to the exclusion of the residue of his family.'"

Mr. Carson was not present when the will was executed and we find the unusual condition in this case of the one charged with exerting the undue influence with having advised the testatrix not to make a will at the time she did. He said to her:

"That she had been ill before just like that, and she would be all right in a few days."

[4] Upon the question of resentment and dislikes, we quote the following from Mr. Freeman's notes in Re Hess, 31 Am. St. Rep. at page 680:

"The fact that the testator was prejudiced against or had an aversion for some of the natural objects of his bounty, and therefore disinherited them in favor of others, whether related to him or not, does not establish undue influence, though the will is clearly the fruit of his resentment and dislike [citing cases]. Nor, when family dissensions arise, will the fact that a child not only shared in the feelings of his parent respecting the conduct of another child, and perhaps kept alive and increased the parental resentment, constitute undue influence vitiating a will in favor of the former and against the latter. Woodward v. James, 3 Strob. (S. C.) 552, 51 Am. Dec. 649."

[5] Unusual proof is furnished in the instant case of the deliberate act in the execution of the will. It is first shown that the testatrix herself directed arrangements to be made for its execution. When the attorney arrived, a reasonable range of discussion followed between himself and the testatrix and, after ascertaining the wishes of Mrs. Carson, Mr. Gebhart began preparing the will. Before it was finished, the doctor arrived, and Mrs. Carson discussed matters in his presence, and, after the doctor read the will to her, and she had signed it, he, with the attorney, signed as witnesses. The attorney left taking the will with him. About the time he was leaving, the nurse had returned from another patient she had been attending and Mrs. Carson told her she arrived too late to be present when the will was made, but seemed relieved that the task was over and said: "I can rest easy now," etc. And she told the nurse how she had made the will and how happy she had been with Mr. Carson and told her that she had told the daughter before: "That she did not need to expect anything from her," etc. Whatever insinuations may be made against the attorney or Mr. Carson by the contestant, we are unable to see the slightest suspicion that could attach to the doctor or the nurse. No one even attempted to question their honesty and standing in the community and no impeachment of their testimony was even attempted. It seems that such direct evidence stands out so strongly that nothing less than the most convincing circumstantial evidence should be permitted to overcome such testimony. No one could doubt that they were innocent of any knowledge of any wrongdoing. According to their description of what took place, the conclusion is irresistible that Mrs. Carson was able to and did keep in mind all things necessary to qualify her to make a will, and was, at the "very time and in the very act" free to act and capable of acting in the execution of her will.

[6] Contestant seemed to think Mrs. Carson should not have changed attorneys. It does not appear that Mrs. Carson had occasion to employ an attorney many times. It would be difficult to try to account for the reasons why people change or select their attorneys. It may be that Mrs. Carson, after Mr. Carson came back and they were reconciled, thought the daughter and Mr. Dunn had encouraged divorce proceedings too strongly, and then again she might have said some rather severe things about the husband while he was away, and to meet Mr. Dunn again with her husband, or otherwise, knowing she had returned to him, would embarrass her, and then again, as the daughter knew Mr. Dunn so well, Mrs. Carson might have been fearful that the daughter would find out too much about her business in the future, assuming she was angry with her. No attention was paid to a like situation in the Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932, and in that case a different attorney had drawn a previous will.

After a careful consideration of the record, we feel constrained to say, in the language of the Supreme Court in the Estate of

"In that case the verdict was against the validity of the will, and the judgment and order denying a new trial were reversed; and it would be inconsistent with the decision of this court in that case to affirm the judgment in the case at bar. Numerous authorities upon the subject may be found in the notes to In re Hess, 31 Am. St. Rep. 665."

Since the McDevitt Case was decided, so many cases have been decided in this state setting aside verdicts of juries which have condemned wills on the ground of undue influence and to properly note and analyze all of them would fill a volume, but, if we have read them correctly, they seem to evince a firm, unvarying course to adhere to the principles laid down in the McDevitt Case. The instant case is largely a case of "general influence not brought to bear directly upon the testamentary act," and a case also supported by declarations of the testatrix introduced to show "state of mind." We may appropriately say with the court upon the question of general influence, in the early case of Woodward v. James, 3 Strob. (S. C.) 552, 51 Am. Dec. 649, supra, cited in many jurisdictions and by our Supreme Court in Re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 295, 49 P. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179:

"These unanimous decisions of our own courts, one would think, ought to put an end to applications to set aside last wills and testaments, on account of the mere general influence of legatees, without which, any legacy is seldom given at all, or on account of a supposed perverseness, in the distribution of his property, by the testator, or on account of his supposed unnatural dislike to his near relations, and the like; the more especially when we find that foreign jurists and judges have very uniformly laid down the same rules," etc.

[7] Undue influence may be established by circumstantial evidence, but—

" 'it must, however, do more than raise a suspicion. It must amount to proof, and such evidence has the force of proof only when circumstances are proven which are inconsistent with the claim that the will was the spontaneous act of the alleged testator. I think there is nothing beyond suspicion shown here.' " Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. at page 709, 198 P. 407, 411, quoting from Estate of McDevitt.

"There is no proof. Circumstances have been proven which accord with the theory of undue influence, none of which are inconsistent with the hypothesis that the will was the free act of an intelligent mind. This does not amount to proof, and many circumstances are shown which are wholly inconsistent with the hypothesis of undue influence, and the presumption of law, in the absence of all proof in a contest, is in favor of the will." (Italics ours.) In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 304, 44 P. 577, quoting from the Estate of McDevitt.

We also quote the following from notes in Re Hess, at pages 687 and 688:

"To invalidate a will on the ground of undue influence, there must be affirmative evidence of the facts from which such influence is to be inferred. It is not sufficient to show that the party benefited by the will had the motive or the opportunity to exert such influence; there must be evidence that he did exert it, and so control the actions of the testator, either by importunities which he could not resist, or by deception, fraud, or other improper means, that the instrument is not really the will of the testator. * * * The burden of proof being on those who attack a will on the ground of undue influence, it is not sufficient that they barely show that the circumstances of the will are consistent with the hypothesis of undue influence; for this would be but to create an equipoise in the testimony, and the onus being on the party attacking the will, he must go a step further, and show by any suitable evidence the inconsistency between circumstances of the execution of the will, and its being executed without the interposition of undue influence" (citing many cases).

[8] The undue influence that must be proven to set aside a will, formally and solemnly executed, is clearly defined in the case of In re Kaufman, supra:

" 'Undue influence, however used, must, in order to avoid a will, destroy the free agency of the testator at the time and in the very act of the making of the testament. It must bear directly upon the testamentary act. * * * The fact, then, that a testator with such qualifications makes a foolish, unnatural, or unjust will, does not show that undue influence caused the will.' " Estate of Donovan, supra, at page 394, 73 P. 1082—citing many cases.

[9] From the evidence it would appear that Mrs. Carson was an unusually well-preserved woman for her age. She appeared to have no organic disease whatever. This is a rare condition for one of her age. No expert testimony was offered to prove that she was weak in any respect. Only a few acquaintances questioned her soundness and they, it seemed, had ceased to be friends after Mrs. Carson married, and their opinions could not be stronger than the facts upon which they were based:

"The opinion of a witness that a person is of unsound mind can be no stronger than or of superior evidentiary weight to the reasons upon which he bases his opinion." Estate of Campbell, 46 Cal. App. 621, 189 P. 812, 815, and see Waddington v. Busby, 45 N. J. Eq. 173, 14 Am. St. Rep. 706.

One of the witnesses in the instant case said:

"I do not know whether the woman was insane; I would say at times she was not real sound mind. She acted queer at times."

Another testified: "Well, not exactly sound," and a third said the decedent "was of unsound mind off and on for years." Against this testimony many witnesses testified that Mrs. Carson, while perhaps an uneducated woman who had worked hard all her life, was quite a bright old lady; "a lovely old lady," as one of the witnesses said. The evidence was practically all this way. Besides, the doctor who was present when the will was executed declared her fully competent to execute the will. We think we may say the doctor was one of Sacramento's prominent and well-known physicians. His character and standing as a man and as a physician were not questioned at the trial. When Dr. Lindsay was sworn, the following occurred:

"Mr. Chester: Dr. Lindsay's qualifications will be admitted, I take it.

"Mr. Zagoren: As to what, as a doctor or a witness?

"The Court: In every respect.

"Mr. Zagoren: We admit both qualifications."

We enlarge upon this, because we must discuss later the question whether the jury had any right to refuse to follow the effect of his testimony as to the soundness of mind of testatrix at the very time of the execution of the will. No evidence was introduced to show the testatrix had ever lost anything by the mismanagement of her business affairs or otherwise. She must have managed well, else, no doubt, it would have been proven otherwise. She dealt with lawyers and doctors and real estate men, bankers and many other business men. She was very particular, for instance, that she did not lose the interest when the transfer of her money was made from the D. O. Mills Bank to another. Not one of these business men testified that she was not competent to transact her business, or that they observed any weakness in any respect in regard to her. The evidence also shows that up to the time she was taken down in her last illness she had her bedroom upstairs and walked up and down stairs daily, and up to the last did much of her cooking and housework. Of course, she may have had some of the usual nervousness due to old age. From all of this evidence, together with the strong testimony given by the subscribing witnesses and the nurse, it would appear that—

"The case bears no analogy to that of a testator who contributes nothing to his will but a series of nods and a cross or a signature traced by a guiding hand stronger than his own."

[10] It seems that a great many of the wills coming before the courts are not made until the hand of death is almost laid upon the maker, usually after the doctor gives the last warning, and this is usually withheld as long as there is hope, as the worry caused by the knowledge of the approach of death might have a depressing effect upon the patient. The courts must then take the conditions as they find them, and as the law permits wills to be made at such times, and as the conditions usually make it the last chance, a duty devolves upon the courts to give effect to every safeguard the law has provided to protect the will, if it appears to be the true will, and to see that it stands, though necessarily sometimes made in some degree of weakness. "To set aside a will * * * is a serious matter; and a verdict having that effect should be closely scrutinized by the trial judge. The upsetting of wills is a growing evil"—quoted with approval in Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 505, 82 P. 57. The cases reveal varying degrees of strength of mind in the compass of a few days and if the will is executed on the day when the mind is strong enough to resist the undue influence, if any there be, the will must be sustained. Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 221 P. 361.

The following are some of the cases in which it was alleged undue influence was exerted upon a weak mind caused by old age or sickness or both and the reviewing court held the evidence of undue influence was insufficient: Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 257, 104 P. 6; Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57; Estate of Calef, 139 Cal. 673, 73 P. 539; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 P. 915; Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 P. 872; Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932; Estate of Relph, supra; Estate of Holloway (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 1012; Estate of Bryson, 191 Cal. 521, 217 P. 525; Estate of Hanlon, 65 Cal. App. 592, 224 P. 772; Estate of Rickey, 64 Cal. App. 733, 222 P. 628; Estate of Perkins (Cal. Sup.) 235 P. 45; Estate of Clark, 170 Cal. 418, 149 P. 828; In re Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 49 P. 192, 59 Am. St. Rep. 179.

The following cases show activity in preparing the will by the beneficiary or close relative or agent: A comparison of the conduct of Mr. Carson with the conduct exhibited in the following cases where the will was upheld, will be useful: Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121 P. 733; Estate of Morey, supra; Estate of Calef, supra; Estate of Higgins, supra; Estate of Lavinburg, supra; Estate of Holloway, supra; Estate of Purcell, supra; Estate of Anderson, supra; Estate of Hickey, supra; In re Ricks' Estate, 160 Cal. 467, 117 P. 539; Estate of Relph, supra; Estate of Clark, supra; Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441. We cite one outside case for the reason that it is so frequently cited by our courts. In re Hess, supra.

In many of the foregoing cases the person charged with the undue influence actually remained in the room while the will was being made, and in the Lavinburg Case, the one charged with the undue influence actually boasted of her general influence over the testator. In the same case the court, at page 543 of the decision, stating a reason why a certain daughter was probably not properly remembered in the will, say:

"And in this connection it is well to remember that the testator was not upon good terms with Mrs. Werthman when the will was drawn."

And in a similar quarrel between a mother and a daughter wherein the mother practically disinherited the daughter, the Supreme Court in the case of In re Kaufman, supra, say:

"Lizzie never afterward saw or communicated with her mother. * * * The greater part of the record is taken up with the circumstances of this quarrel between Lizzie and her mother, apparently either for the purpose of showing to the jury that the mother had no sufficient reason therein for disinheriting her daughter, or in order to allow the jury to conjecture that the mother's dislike of Lizzie may have been fostered by her other sisters. Whatever may have been the reason for its introduction, it was immaterial and irrelevant to either of the issues submitted to the jury."

The following are some of the cases of undue influence in which powers of attorney and other authority were given, but in which it was held that this in itself does not create a presumption of undue influence. This condition will be found in the following cases, wherein the will was upheld by the reviewing court: Estate of Lavinburg, supra; Estate of Morcel, supra; Estate of Purcell, supra; Estate of Ricks, supra; Estate of Bryson, supra; Estate of Hanlon, supra. The following are some of the cases in which undue influence was denied to be sufficient where the second wife or husband were charged with undue influence, and where jealousy and bad feeling resulted in quarrels, etc.: Estate of Morcel, supra; Estate of Rickey, supra; Estate of Langford, supra; Estate of Donovan, supra.

[11] The instances will be found rare where our Supreme Court has permitted a will to be upset solely upon the ground of undue influence where the charges have been made against the husband or wife. No presumption is permitted to be indulged against this relation in this state, and it is not permitted in most other jurisdictions. Our Supreme Court, in the Estate of Donovan, supra, at page 395, 73 P. 1082, very clearly adopted this view:

"There is no legal presumption against the validity of any provision which a husband may make in the wife's favor, for she may justly influence the making of her husband's will for her own benefit or that of others so long as she does not act fraudulently, or extort benefits from her husband when he is not in condition to exercise his faculties as a free agent."

The Langford Case, supra, is full of expressions of like purport, and has been approved in later cases. Mr. Freeman, in his notes in Re Hess, supra, at page 679, places this right above that of the child:

"While the right of children may not stand on the same high footing as that of a wife to be heard respecting a will, still there is no doubt that they have the right to influence their parent by fair argument, or even by entreaty, to make disposition of his property in their favor. * * * So long as no fraud is practiced upon the testator, and no advantage taken of his weakness and his inability to resist, his bounty may be sought by every appeal to his intelligence or his emotions, which may lawfully influence his judgment or his affections. He may be flattered, persuaded, or entreated, * * * the importunity may be such as no delicate mind could be guilty of, * * * and yet if he yield intelligently, and from conviction, the influence thus operating is not undue, * * * 'solicitations, however importunate, cannot of themselves constitute undue influence, for, though these may have a constraining effect, they do not destroy the testator's power to freely dispose of his estate'" (citing many cases).

See, also, 28 R. C. L. § 94, and notes.

Nearly all of the cases wherein the courts have approved the setting aside of the will on the ground of undue influence, the circumstances are shown, not by inference, but by positive proof that the person charged with exerting the undue influence was active in procuring the execution of the will, or was guilty of trying to keep relatives away from the testator, or both, as in the Estate of Tibbetts, 137 Cal. 123, 69 P. 978; Estate of Kendrick, 130 Cal. 360, 62 P. 605; Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 P. 598; Estate of Olson, 19 Cal. App. 379, 126 P. 171. In Estate of Ramey, 62 Cal. App. 413, 217 P. 135, the evidence of Mrs. Wilcoxson would support a finding that the person charged with the undue influence was present when the will was discussed and executed and there is other evidence that when executed the will was immediately given by the testatrix into the keeping of the person charged with the undue influence. In all of these cases the activities in having the will executed by the person charged are disgustingly prominent and they are not merely suspected, but sufficient circumstances are positively proven upon which the jury could act, and in the Estates of Kendrick and Ramey, a very bad condition of mind and body were proven. In the Tibbetts Case, one of the cases respondent urges very strongly upon us for consideration, the Supreme Court, in its decision, said, "The case is undoubtedly a very close one," and Justice Temple, who wrote the opinion in the McDevitt Case, and Justice Harrison, who wrote the opinions in the Kaufman and Calkins Cases, dissented from the judgment. In the Estate of Kendrick, the court say:

"Upon the question of the sufficiency of this evidence to support the verdict that the will was procured by undue influence, we confess a feeling of some doubt. The question is a close one."

In Estate of Ramey, the court, referring to the question of undue influence, which it had just been considering, said:

"The other question seems less difficult of solution." (Meaning the question of unsoundness of mind.)

In Estate of Olson, the evidence seemed to have been so strong in proof of the undue influence that the appellant did not take the evidence before the reviewing court, but relied upon an effort to attack the pleadings. In that case the design of the person charged with the undue influence was proven by his own statements and it was clearly proven that he went with the testatrix and was present during the preparation of the will and immediately left with her after its preparation. This point was commented upon by the court, citing Estate of Snowball, supra, and saying, at page 388 (126 P. 175):

"A similar circumstance was given significance where the favored daughter of the testatrix went to the office of the lawyer with the testatrix, who then made the will 'while the daughter remained in another room.'"

The charges in the Olson Case are particularly revolting and seem to have been fully proven.

The judgment should be reversed, and it is so ordered.

GREGG v. McDONALD. (Civ. 4213.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1925.)

1. Partnership ⟸21—Contract for purchase of pool hall business held to impose mutual obligations.

Under contract for employment of plaintiff as manager of a pool hall, providing that agreement should constitute a contract for purchase by plaintiff of a one-third interest in the business, held, that parties were mutually obligated—one to buy and the other to sell.

2. Contracts ⟸143—Obligations of party may be inferred from undertakings of other party.

Obligations of party need not be expressly stated in the contract, but may be inferred from undertakings of other party.

3. Master and servant ⟸36—Discharged employee held not required to tender performance of contract.

In suit for breach of contract to employ plaintiff as manager of a pool hall business, and to allow him to purchase an interest therein, plaintiff held not required to allege or prove that he had paid or tendered to defendant agreed purchase price for an interest in the business, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 1440, 1784, after his discharge by defendant, and after he was notified that defendant would not perform his part of the contract, since such discharge and notice constituted a breach of the entire contract, and plaintiff's cause of action arose immediately without reference to any tender of payment.

4. Master and servant ⟸36—Plaintiff not required after discharge to offer to go on with employment.

In suit for breach of contract to employ plaintiff as manager of defendant's pool hall business, plaintiff was not required after his discharge to present himself to defendant and to offer to go on with his employment; it being sufficient that he was ready to continue in defendant's employ as manager of the business at time of his discharge.

5. Master and servant ⟸3(2)—Contract held to be for employment as manager.

Contract for employment of plaintiff as manager of defendant's pool hall business, providing that plaintiff should be employed in conducting and managing of such business, and that he should give all his time and attention thereto, held to manifest an intention in view of practical construction by parties, that both parties understood that plaintiff was to be employed as manager of the business and not in some other rôle.

6. Master and servant ⟸8(1)—Contract held to imply right to continue employment during full term, unless employee should elect to purchase interest.

Contract for employment of plaintiff as manager of defendant's pool hall business, giving him all of 5 years, if he chose to take it, within which to make his payment for a one-third interest in the business, held to imply that plaintiff should have the right to continue in defendant's employ during full term of 5 years, unless he should elect sooner to pay purchase price for interest which he had agreed to buy.

7. Master and servant ⟸41(1, 6)—Damages for wrongful discharge prima facie wages, and employer must rebut presumption.

Measure of recovery by a wrongfully discharged employee is prima facie agreed wage for unexpired part of the term, and burden is on employer to rebut this presumption by proof that damages were actually less.

8. Master and servant ⟸42(2)—"Other employment" after discharge defined.

The "other employment" that a discharged employee is bound to seek in order to reduce employer's damages is employment of a character substantially similar to that of which he has been deprived.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Other.]

9. Master and servant ⟸41(1)—Damages for breach of contract held agreed wage for unexpired term.

In suit for damages for breach of contract of employment, measure of plaintiff's damages was agreed wage for unexpired part of term, where there was no evidence that he was actually engaged in profitable employment at any time during balance of the term subsequent to his discharge, or that he had been offered and declined other similar employment, or that he could have procured such employment by reasonable diligence.

10. Appeal and error ⊂=1066—Trial ⊂=252(1)—Instructions based on legitimate evidence only should be given; when irrelevant instruction constitutes reversible error stated.

Such instructions only should be given as are based on legitimate evidence in the case, but giving of an irrelevant instruction, if it is unobjectionable as an abstract proposition of law, is not reversible error, if it is not calculated to mislead jury, but, if calculated to mislead the jury and affect their conclusion upon the issue submitted to them, it is prejudicial and reversible error.

11. Trial ⊂=252(20)—Instruction on measure of damages for breach of agreement held misleading.

Instruction that, if defendant by breach of his agreement deprived plaintiff of an opportunity to acquire a one-third interest in defendant's business, it might be considered as an element of damages, held calculated to mislead jurors and to affect their conclusion on amount of damages awarded, where there was no showing that any profits ever had been, or ever would be, earned in the business.

12. Appeal and error ⊂=930(2)—Reviewing tribunal cannot assume that jury willfully disregarded instructions given by court.

Reviewing tribunal cannot assume that jury willfully disregarded their sworn duty to consider all instructions given them by court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by O. M. Gregg against T. J. McDonald. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George J. Denis and George W. McDill, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Bledsoe, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action for damages and also for accrued wages sought to be recovered by reason of an alleged breach of contract. The action was tried before a jury, a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $5,000 was returned, and judgment entered accordingly. From that judgment the defendant appeals.

On July 30, 1920, at the city of Los Angeles, defendant as the party of the first part, and plaintiff, as the party of the second part, executed a written contract as follows:

"This agreement made this 30th day of July, 1920, by and between T. J. McDonald, party of the first part, and O. M. Gregg, party of the second part, witnesseth: Whereas, said first party is about to engage in the bowling alley and pool room business in a building to be erected for said first party for said purpose at 828 South Olive street, in the city of Los Angeles, and it is desired that second party shall be employed by said first party in the conducting and management of said business with the view also to his buying an interest in said business and ultimately becoming a partner therein: Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed that if said building is built, and if said first party shall secure a lease of same and shall establish said business so contemplated as aforesaid, said second party shall enter into the employ of said first party in said business and that he shall purchase a one-third interest in said business within 5 years from date hereof, at the actual cost of installing and equipping said business, to wit, at a purchase price of one-third of the actual cost of installing bowling alleys, pool tables, racks, and other equipment and furniture used in said business, and the other expenses of installing said business; it being contemplated that said first party shall receive from said second party for said one-third interest a total sum sufficient to cover one-third of the total amount invested by said first party in said business. It is agreed that said second party shall give all of his time and attention to the conduct of said business and shall receive a salary of one hundred seventy-five dollars ($175.00) per month and shall further be allowed 3 per cent. of the net profits of said business, computed monthly if possible, which 3 per cent. shall not be paid to said second party, but shall be turned over to said first party when ascertained and shall be credited by him upon the purchase price of said one-third interest in said business. It is understood and agreed that said business shall be carried on in the name of said first party and that this agreement shall not be deemed to constitute a partnership between the parties hereto but merely as a contract covering the conditions of employment of said second party by said first party and for the purchase by second party from said first party of said one-third interest in said business.

"In witness whereof the parties have hereunto set their hands the day and year first above written:

"T. J. McDonald,
"Ona M. Gregg."

It will be noticed that the contract is of a dual character—that it bears two aspects: In one aspect it is a contract of employment; in the other it is a contract to purchase an interest in the business. These two features are so intimately blended and related to each other that the breach of one necessarily involves a breach of the other, though the measure of damages for a breach of one is not the same as that which is applicable to a breach of the other.

About September 1, 1920, plaintiff entered upon the performance of his duties as manager of the pool room business under the terms of his contract. By a supplemental agreement in writing, bearing date January 17, 1921, the contract of July 30, 1920, was modified in certain particulars. By this supplemental contract the parties agreed that plaintiff's salary should be $150 per month instead of $175, as provided for in the original contract, and that he should be credited with 4 per cent. of the net profits of the business instead of 3 per cent. as originally agreed.

The complaint is in two counts: One for damages for the alleged breach of the contract by reason of the wrongful discharge of plaintiff; and the other for accrued wages due under the contract and remaining unpaid. In the first count plaintiff alleged that on March 16, 1921, he was wrongfully discharged by defendant from the latter's employ; that ever since his discharge defendant has refused to ascertain his 4 per cent. of the net profits or to give him credit therefor on the purchase price of the one-third interest in the business; that at all times since March 1, 1921, the business has been operating at a profit; that under plaintiff's management the business would have earned a profit of $100,000 at the end of the term of 5 years, and that his 4 per cent. thereof would amount to $4,000; that the cost of installing the bowling alleys, pool tables, racks, and other equipment and furniture was $50,000; that during the 5 years for which he was to be employed the value of the equipment and business would have increased, and that it would have amounted to $100,000 at the end of the term; that the lease of the building in which the business is conducted runs for a term of 15 years from August, 1920, and is constantly increasing in value; that by reason of the premises he has been damaged in the sum of $20,000. In the second count plaintiff alleges the contract of employment, his discharge and that there is due him and unpaid the sum of $975 for salary earned prior to his discharge. Issue having been joined upon many of the material allegations of the complaint, the cause was tried before the jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff, as already stated.

Since the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered on account of the prejudicial error later to be considered, we shall consider such of appellant's points as are likely to arise on a retrial.

[1, 2] We do not agree with appellant that the contract gave him only an optional right to sell the one-third interest to respondent. We think that under the terms of the contract the parties were mutually obligated—the one to buy and the other to sell. The instrument contains these significant and pregnant clauses:

"* * * It is desired that second party [respondent] shall be employed * * * with the view also to his buying an interest in said business and ultimately becoming a partner therein;" "* * * it is agreed * * * that said second party * * * shall purchase a one-third interest;" "* * * it is * * * agreed * * * that this agreement shall * * * constitute * * * merely * * * a contract covering the conditions of employment * * * and for the purchase by said second party from said first party of said one-third interest in said business."

There can be little doubt that when the parties expressly stated in their writing that their agreement should constitute a "contract * * * for the purchase by said second party * * * of said one-third interest," they understood that appellant was just as much obligated to sell as respondent was to buy. It is uniformly held that the obligation of a party need not be expressly stated in the contract, but may be inferred from the undertakings of the other party. Thus it has been held that where one party agrees to buy from the other, and nothing is expressly said as to the obligation of the latter to sell, such obligation to sell may be implied. Thomas-Huycke-Martin Co. v. Gray, 94 Ark. 9, 125 S. W. 659, 140 Am. St. Rep. 93.

[3] It was not necessary for respondent to allege or prove that he had paid or tendered to appellant the agreed purchase price for the one-third interest. This is not the case of a breach of contract by the seller before the arrival of a fixed time for performance by him. It was not agreed that appellant's obligation to sell should accrue at the end of the 5 years. The language of the agreement is that respondent "shall purchase a one-third interest in said business within 5 years from date hereof." This left indefinite the time for payment by respondent, and it left equally indefinite the time for the transfer of the one-third interest by appellant. The law implies that payment was to be made upon the transfer of the one-third interest to respondent. Civ. Code, § 1784; Blackwood v. Cutting Packing Co., 76 Cal. 215, 18 P. 248, 9 Am. St. Rep. 199. Respondent could make payment of the full amount of the purchase price at any time within the 5 years, and thereupon he would become entitled to a transfer of the one-third interest to him. In such cases, if the seller repudiates his contract and gives the buyer notice that he will not carry it out, and does not retract his repudiation before the action is commenced, the buyer, not being in default, is not required to tender performance on his part before suing for breach of the contract. Civ. Code, § 1440; Stum v. Hadrich, 7 Cal. App. 241, 94 P. 82. Not only was respondent not required to tender performance after his discharge and after he was notified by appellant that the latter would not perform his part of the contract, but such discharge and notice constituted a breach of the entire contract, and respondent's cause of action arose immediately, without reference to any tender of payment. Stum v. Hadrich, supra.

[4] Nor was it incumbent upon respondent, after his discharge, to present himself to appellant and offer to go on with his employment. It is enough that he was ready and willing to continue in appellant's employ, as manager of the business, at the time of his discharge. Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Stumer v. Wilson, 82 Ill. App. 384. The case of Winsor v. Silica Brick Co., 31 Cal. App. 85, 159 P. 877, cited by appellant is not in point. In that case the letter to the employee announcing his release from the contract did not involve a clear and unequivocal discharge. Here appellant incontinently discharged respondent and refused to permit him to continue in his employ as manager of the business. An offer by the employee to proceed with the performance of his contract of employment after his employer has unconditionally and peremptorily discharged him and has refused to permit him to continue to perform the duties for which he was employed would, as was said in Winsor v. Silica Brick Co., supra, be "a useless and futile act." Such dismissal is of itself a sufficient prevention of performance of the contract to entitle the employee to bring his action for its breach.

[5] Respondent was employed as manager of the business, and not in any other capacity. His discharge from that position was, therefore, a wrongful discharge from his employment. The written contract not only contains the recital that "it is desired" that respondent shall be employed "in the conducting and management of said business," but it is expressly agreed that he "shall give all of his time and attention to the conduct of said business," not to the conduct of a minor department of the business. The whole tenor of the contract leads irresistibly to the conclusion that both parties understood that respondent was to be employed as manager of the business, and not in some other rôle. Indeed, the parties themselves put this construction upon their writing. This is indicated by the fact that respondent took charge of the business as its manager with appellant's acquiescence, and continued in that capacity until he was wrongfully discharged some 6½ months later.

[6] Appellant had not the right to discharge respondent before the expiration of the 5 years mentioned in the contract. By the terms of their agreement respondent was given all of the 5 years, if he chose to take it, within which to make his payment for the one-third interest; that is to say, it was optional with him to pay the whole of the purchase price for the one-third interest before or at the end of the 5 years. If he chose to wait until the end of that period before making full payment, he would be entitled to remain in appellant's employ as manager of the business for the full term mentioned in their agreement. This is the necessary result of that provision of the contract, which contemplates that a part at least of the purchase price shall be deducted from respondent's salary; that is to say, in addition to the $150 per month, which amount he was to retain, respondent was to receive for his services a further monthly sum equal to 4 per cent. of the net profits of the business, if any there were. This percentage of the profits, computed monthly if possible, was to be applied by appellant upon the price to be paid by respondent for the one-third interest. Since respondent was to have all of the 5 years, if he wanted that length of time, within which to pay for the one-third interest, it follows that the contract, considered in its entirety, clearly implies that he should have the right to continue in appellant's employ during the full term of 5 years, earning the 4 per cent. to be applied upon his contract of purchase, unless he should elect sooner to pay the purchase price for the interest which he had agreed to buy.

[7-9] It was shown that respondent had been earning $100 per month immediately prior to his entry into appellant's service. Wherefore, it is suggested that his earning capacity equals that amount, and that, therefore, the damages sustained by him as a discharged employee could not exceed $50 per month for the unexpired balance of the 5-year term. But there was no evidence that respondent was actually engaged in profitable employment at any time during the balance of the term subsequent to his discharge, or that he had been offered and had declined other employment of a character substantially similar to that of which he had been deprived, or that he could have obtained such employment by the exercise of reasonable diligence. The measure of recovery by a wrongfully discharged employee is generally and primarily—or "prima facie," as many cases put it—the agreed wage for the unexpired part of the term; and the burden is upon the employer to rebut this presumption by proof that the damages sustained were actually less. If, for example, the employer contends, in mitigation of damages, that the employee was actually engaged in other profitable service during the term, or that such employment was offered to him and rejected, or that by the exercise of reasonable diligence he could have found such employment, the burden is upon him to show it. 8 Cal. Jur. 896; 18 R. C. L. 523. "The 'other employment' that the discharged employee is bound to seek is employment of a character substantially similar to that of which he has been deprived; he need not enter upon service of a more menial kind." 18 R. C. L. p. 529.

[10] The trial court gave an instruction which was not warranted by the evidence. We agree with appellant that it was calculated to mislead the jurors and to affect their conclusion on the amount of damages to be awarded by them. We are satisfied, therefore, that the giving of it was prejudicial error necessitating a reversal of the judgment. The rule deducible from the authorities is this: Such instructions only should be given as are based upon legitimate evidence in the case. If an irrelevant instruction be given, and if it is unobjectionable as an abstract proposition of law, the giving of it is a mere technical, but not a reversible, error, if it is not calculated to mislead the jury. If, however, it is calculated to mislead the jury and to affect their conclusion upon the issue submitted to them, it is prejudicial and reversible error. Coughlin v. People, 18 Ill. 266, 68 Am. Dec. 541; Mendelsohn v. Anaheim Lighter Co., 40 Cal. 657; Perkins v. Eckert, 55 Cal. 400; People v. Roe, 189 Cal. 559, 209 P. 560.

[11, 12] The instruction in question (we italicize the parts of which complaint is made) reads—

"If you believe from the evidence, ladies and gentlemen of the jury, that the contract alleged in the complaint was made by the plaintiff and defendant, and that plaintiff entered upon the discharge of the duties of manager of defendant's business under the terms of the contract, and that defendant thereafter discharged plaintiff without cause, and has ever since refused to allow plaintiff to perform the employment which he contracted to perform, then I instruct you that defendant is liable in damages for any loss suffered by the plaintiff as the natural result of such breach of contract, and which was within the reasonable contemplation of plaintiff and defendant in entering into the contract. If you find from the evidence that the defendant by breach of his agreement deprived the plaintiff of all opportunity to acquire a one-third interest in defendant's business described in the complaint, this is an element of damage to be considered by you in arriving at your verdict. Also, you may consider whether the evidence shows that plaintiff, at the instance of defendant, and for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to enter upon the duties specified in the contract in question, did leave and surrender an established business, or avocation, and thus sustained damage to himself. With reference to the salary of the plaintiff as manager, specified in the contract alleged in the complaint, I instruct you, if you believe from the evidence that the contract alleged in the complaint was entered into between plaintiff and defendant, and that thereafter plaintiff entered upon the duties of manager of defendant's business in pursuance of the terms of said contract, and that defendant in the month of May, 1921, discharged plaintiff from the said employment as manager, without cause, and in violation of the terms of said contract, the plaintiff is entitled, as a part of his damages, to the entire salary provided by the contract for the full 5-year term, commencing with the date of his employment. From the amount of his salary for the full term, if the jury finds for the plaintiff, the jury must deduct any sum which plaintiff has already been paid thereon by defendant."

There was no evidence showing, or tending to show, that any profits ever had been or ever would be earned in the business. There was no evidence showing, or tending to show, that the one-third interest which appellant was to transfer to respondent had, or ever would have, any value whatever. Indeed, for aught that appears to the contrary, that interest if purchased by respondent, may have proved to be a liability instead of an asset.

If the jury had returned a verdict on the first count for an amount exactly equal to the stipulated salary for the unexpired term of employment, less the amount already paid by appellant, it is possible that we then could have said that the irrelevant part of the instruction had not affected the result. Had that been the precise amount of the verdict, it may be that we could have said that the jurors had ignored the part of the charge advising them to consider as "an element of damage" respondent's opportunity to acquire the one-third interest. But, be that as it may, the jury returned a verdict for an amount which is less than respondent's agreed salary for the balance of the term after deducting the previous payments. We can conceive of no explanation to account for the amount arrived at by the jurors, save upon the theory that they possibly took notice of local business conditions and concluded therefrom that respondent, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, could have found other similar employment long before the expiration of the balance of the 5-year term, which still had more than 4 years to run. At any rate, having returned a verdict for a sum considerably less than the amount of the agreed wage for the balance of the term minus the previous payments, we have no means of knowing how much the jurors allowed respondent for loss of the stipulated amount of salary and how much they may have undertaken to allow him for the loss of his opportunity to purchase the one-third interest in the business. We are bound to assume that they allowed him some amount for the loss of his opportunity to purchase an interest in the business, notwithstanding the utter absence of evidence to show that it was of any value, for not only were they distinctly told that loss of opportunity to purchase the interest "is an element of damage," but they were also told that it is an element of damage "to be considered by you in arriving at your verdict." And later on in the instruction they were told that, if respondent was wrongfully discharged, he was entitled to the entire salary for the full five years, less previous payments, "as a part of his damages." This language necessarily must have created the inference that respondent was entitled to substantial damages for the loss of his opportunity to purchase the one-third interest as well as damages suffered by him as a discharged employee. There is no escaping the conclusion that the part of the instruction of which complaint is made, though not based upon any evidence in the case, necessarily must have augmented the verdict to some extent if the jurors considered it, as they were told they must. We cannot assume that they willfully disregarded their sworn duty to consider all instructions given them by the court. When it is clear—as it seems to us in the instant case—that the instruction was calculated to mislead the jurors, and that in all likelihood it affected their conclusion as to the amount of the verdict, prejudicially to the appellant, the giving of it "constitutes error equally as grave as would be the giving of instructions fundamentally wrong." People v. Roe, supra.

I concur: WORKS, J.

CRAIG, J. I dissent. To my mind the giving of the instruction which my associates consider of a prejudicially erroneous character is not a sufficient ground for reversal. It is doubtful whether or not the instruction in question is a correct statement of the law, but if it is conceded, without admitting the legal correctness of the concession, that the instruction was erroneous, there is nothing to indicate that the error prejudiced the appellant, and therefore the judgment should be sustained.

The verdict is general in its character. Evidence contained in the record conclusively supports a recovery for the plaintiff and respondent, based upon loss of former employment, as well as loss of salary under the contract. No evidence whatever was introduced to sustain the allegation of the complaint referred to by the instruction in question and having to do with the loss of opportunity to purchase an interest in the business. This in itself furnishes strong reason to believe that the jury based its verdict upon the former rather than the latter ground. Aside from this indication, there is nothing upon which even an intelligent guess might be hazarded to say for which element of damages pleaded in the complaint the award was made. Under these circumstances a conclusion that the appellant was prejudiced must be predicated upon a presumption that the jury acted so unjustly as to return a substantial verdict against the defendant without the slightest proof that as to the ground upon which it was based he had done more than commit a technical wrong, for which the plaintiff had suffered no loss. Further, it would be necessary for us to presume that the jury disregarded the court's instructions upon other phases of the case in which damages in an amount greater than the sum allowed were clearly proven. I apprehend that it is not the province or the practice of appellate courts to indulge in these presumptions, which at once reflect upon the integrity of juries and impugn their intelligence. Rather, I think the law as well as experience and reason require that contrary presumptions be recognized, and in the absence of proof be given the weight to which they are usually entitled. In the instant case we should therefore presume that the jury took into consideraton the only grounds supported by any evidence upon which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the jury based its verdict upon the only grounds for which a verdict could reasonably have been rendered for the plaintiff.

This procedure is supported by numerous decisions from every jurisdiction, so far as I have been able to ascertain, where the issue here involved has been passed upon. The following are a few of the cases which might be cited: Werner v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 76, 185 P. 1016; Flinn v. Crooks, 2 Cal. App. 335, 83 P. 812; Blizzard v. Applegate, 77 Ind. 516; Bourland v. Baker, 141 Ark. 280, 216 S. W. 707, 20 A. L. R. 525; Valente v. Porto, 98 Conn. 653, 119 A. 888.

In Flinn v. Crooks, supra, the complaint consisted of two counts: The first one for the reasonable value of an attorney's services; and the second was based upon an alleged express contract. No evidence was introduced in support of the second count, but a motion for nonsuit as to that count was erroneously denied. A general verdict for the plaintiff was returned. It was held that as there was no evidence introduced in support of the second count, and the evidence did justify a verdict upon the first count, it would be presumed for the sake of upholding the verdict and the judgment that they were based upon the first count.

Sanders v. Reister, 1 Dak. 151, 46 N. W. 685, involved an instruction that the jury consider inter alia the pecuniary loss, if any proven. Of this there was no evidence. It was said:

"The record does not disclose that there was any evidence introduced even tending to prove pecuniary loss, and we are not to presume the jury found what was not in the evidence."

Werner v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, applied the same rule to an instruction that the jury could find for the plaintiff if it was negligence for the railroad company to make a running switch; the running switch having been directed by plaintiff's decedent. It was there said:

"There might be sufficient ground for appellant's exception to the verdict under the instructions covered by exception No. 31 if there was any evidence before the jury tending to show that there was negligence in attempting the running switch on this occasion. * * * Under this state of the evidence it cannot be assumed that the jury predicated its verdict upon negligence in resorting to this mode of switching cars." (Italics ours.)

In Blizzard v. Applegate, 77 Ind. 516, suit was brought upon two counts: The first on a promissory note, and the second on an account for services as an attorney and for moneys expended. The Supreme Court of Indiana, by an itemized statement set out in its opinion, illustrated how the jury could have found its $600 verdict, saying:

"The appellant assumes that the jury did not allow the appellee anything on the note, and earnestly insists that the evidence does not sustain the verdict on the second paragraph. The verdict was general. We are therefore unable to determine whether or not the jury included the amount apparently due upon the note in the verdict. But there was evidence upon which they could have found for the plaintiff upon the issues under the first paragraph of the complaint, and, if necessary to sustain the verdict, we must presume that they did so; the record showing nothing to the contrary."

In Bourland v. Baker, supra, it was said:

"The instruction is assailed because, according to appellant's interpretation thereof, it submitted all the allegations of negligence set up in the complaint to the jury for consideration, whether supported by evidence or not. It is true evidence was not introduced in support of every allegation of negligence in the complaint. The trend of the evidence, however, limited the issues to whether the injury resulted from fast driving, failure to give a signal of warning, failure to keep a proper lookout, or whether due to appellee's own negligence; and, in the absence of specific objections to the general terms in which the allegations of negligence were submitted, it will be presumed that the jury considered only such grounds of negligence as were supported by the evidence." (Italics supplied.)

But we need not rely upon the decisions of courts of this and other jurisdictions. In this state we have express legislative authority on the matter which appears to me to compel the affirmance of the judgment appealed from. Section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"No judgment, decision, or decree shall be reversed or affected by reason of any error, ruling, instruction, or defect, unless it shall appear from the record that such error, ruling, instruction, or defect was prejudicial, and also that by reason of such error, ruling, instruction, or defect, the said party complaining or appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury, and that a different result would have been probable if such error, ruling, instruction, or defect had not occurred or existed. There shall be no presumption that error is prejudicial, or that injury was done if error is shown."

To the same effect is section 4½ of article 6 of our Constitution.

It must be remembered that the verdict rendered was a general one. There is not the slightest suggestion of evidence in the record on appeal which would indicate that the jury awarded their verdict upon the cause of action for loss of opportunity to purchase an interest in the business. Nor is there any evidence to show that respondent was damaged one cent by reason of being deprived of his opportunity to purchase the one-third interest in the business. Under the authorities above cited, to justify a reversal appellant must not only show that an erroneous instruction has been given, but that the error committed was prejudicial, that by reason of such instruction the party appealing sustained and suffered substantial injury, and also that a different result would have been probable if such instruction had not been given. In the face of the fact that the verdict rendered was fully warranted by evidence sustaining the allegations of loss of other employment and of salary, and that there was none to support the claim of substantial damage by reason of appellant having been prevented from securing an interest in the business, can it be said that if error had not been committed a different verdict would have been rendered? I think not. And, lest an appellate court might consider, as was formerly done, that in the absence of proof either way, prejudice and damage is to be presumed from error, the Legislature in enacting this section of the Code has closed the door against entertaining such argument or applying that presumption.

It has been uniformly held that, if a judgment or order is right upon any theory of law applicable to the case, it must be sustained regardless of the consideration which may have moved the trial court to its conclusion. The ruling may have been correct, but the reasoning or instruction of the trial court is erroneous. An appellate court cannot know the minds of the jury nor adjudge that they were guilty of perpetrating an injustice without evidence or reason therefor, merely because under an instruction given by the court it may have been possible for them to do so. In cases similar to that before us, where the jury has rendered a general verdict, and there is satisfactory evidence to establish other elements of damage alleged in the complaint, it has been held that it will be presumed that the jury rendered its verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the injuries which the evidence sustained, and not to compensate for that which was alleged but not proven.

From these cases, as well as the Code and Constitution, the conclusion is inevitable that, if there was error, it was not of such a character as to require or allow a reversal.

WELCH et ux. v. STRATTON. (Civ. 4815.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 27, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=765—Time for filing points and authorities cannot be extended except by order based on stipulation or affidavit.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 283, providing that attorney may bind his client by agreement filed with clerk or entered in minutes of court, and not otherwise, and Supreme Court rule 2, subd. 5, time for filing points and authorities cannot be extended except by order based on either stipulation or affidavit.

2. Stipulations ⊂=6—Court will not determine whether oral stipulation, denied by party against whom it is invoked, was made.

If party against whom an oral stipulation is invoked denies it was made, court will not hear parties for purpose of determining dispute.

3. Appeal and error ⊂=765 — Diligence warranting extension of time for filing points and authorities held not shown.

Diligence justifying court in permitting filing statement of points and authorities after expiration of time therefor held not established, nor was fact that appellee's counsel made no response to oral statements at different times that appellants' brief would soon be ready effective as extension of time for filing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by James H. Welch and Stella Stone Welch, his wife, against B. C. Stratton. On motion to dismiss appeal of plaintiffs from judgment for defendant. Appeal dismissed.

Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Lucius M. Fall and Henry M. Willis, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal for failure to file appellants' points and authorities within the time provided by the rules.

The transcript was filed August 16, 1924. On September 15, 1924, the parties stipulated in writing that appellants might have 40 days, in addition to the time allowed by the rules, within which to serve and file their opening brief. The stipulation was filed, and an order was made, extending the time accordingly. On October 25, 1924, the parties stipulated in writing to extend appellants' time 40 additional days. In accordance with this stipulation the court entered its order extending the time. Under these stipulations and orders appellants' time to file their points and authorities expired December 4, 1924. On March 23, 1925, respondent served and filed his notice of motion to dismiss the appeal. No points and authorities on behalf of appellants were on file when the notice was given.

Appellants have filed an affidavit of their attorney, in which he states that shortly before the expiration of the time accorded by the last written stipulation, i. e., shortly prior to December 4, 1924, he telephoned to one of respondent's counsel, and that the latter orally agreed during the telephonic conversation to give affiant additional time to file appellants' opening brief; that no definite time for filing the points and authorities was mentioned during the conversation; that affiant had two subsequent conversations with one of respondent's counsel, in each of which affiant stated that he would have appellants' opening brief printed and filed in the near future; that respondent's counsel offered no objection to these statements; that on March 9, 1925, affiant again met the same counsel for respondent, and told him that the brief had been prepared, and that it would be sent to the printer; that affiant delayed the printing of such brief until he was served with respondent's notice of motion to dismiss the appeal, when he immediately sent the brief to the printer, and that thereafter it was printed and was served and filed (without authority) April 2, 1925—ten days after respondent had served and filed his notice of motion to dismiss. The affidavit also sets forth that by reason of the aforementioned conversations with respondent's counsel affiant believed that respondent was in no hurry about the filing of appellants' opening brief.

A counter affidavit by the attorney for respondent, who is referred to in the affidavit of appellants' counsel, has been filed. In this counter affidavit the affiant in effect denies that he orally or at all agreed to extend the time beyond that accorded by the last written stipulation. The affidavit also sets forth, in substance, that affiant from time to time asked appellants' counsel what the latter's intentions were respecting the filing of a brief on behalf of his clients, and that, receiving no satisfactory reply to these requests for information, and believing that appellants had abandoned their appeal, he finally served and filed his notice of motion to dismiss the appeal.

[1] The rules prescribed by the Supreme Court for the government of this court provide:

"The time limited for filing points and authorities shall not be extended except by order of the court upon stipulation of the parties, or on affidavit showing good cause therefor." Rule 2, subd. 5.

Section 283 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"An attorney and counselor shall have authority * * * to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise." (Italics ours.)

[2] No order of court was ever made extending appellants' time to file points and authorities after December 4, 1924; nor did appellants' counsel make any attempt to secure such an order. Under the rules the time could be extended only upon an order therefor based upon either a stipulation or an affidavit. Not only was there no order extending time, but no written stipulation or affidavit was made or filed. "Verbal stipulations with reference to proceedings in pending actions," says the court in McLaughlin v. Clausen, 116 Cal. 490, 48 P. 487, "cannot be regarded except so far as they are admitted by the parties against whom they are sought to be enforced, or have been wholly or in part executed. Reese v. Mahoney, 21 Cal. 306; Smith v. Whittier, 95 Cal. 279 [30 P. 529]. And if a party against whom a verbal stipulation is invoked denies that such a stipulation was made, the court will not hear the parties for the purpose of settling the dispute. Johnson v. Sweeney, 95 Cal. 304 [30 P. 540]."

[3] Aside from the fact that no order was made extending the time after December 4, 1924, and that no written stipulation therefor was ever entered into, appellants, upon their own showing, have failed to disclose reasonable diligence to comply with the rules of court. If, notwithstanding the denials contained in the counter affidavit, it be assumed that an extension of time was orally agreed to by one of respondent's counsel shortly before December 4, 1924, it did not extend the time more than 30 days at the most. As we have stated, no definite time was mentioned in the alleged oral stipulation. Therefore the extension, if any was agreed to by respondent's counsel, was for a reasonable time only. Under the rules 30 days is regarded as a reasonable period within which to file the points and authorities. January 3, 1925, then, marked the limit of time for serving appellants' points and authorities under the oral stipulation—assuming that one was entered into as claimed by them. But appellants did not attempt to file their points and authorities until the lapse of approximately three months after the expiration of the utmost period of time which they possibly could claim under the oral stipulation. The fact that respondent's counsel, when spoken to by appellants' counsel upon two or three occasions subsequent to December 4, 1924, said nothing in response to the latter's statements that the brief would soon be ready for filing, was not effective to extend the time beyond January 3, 1925.

According to the affidavit of appellants' counsel, his clients' brief was ready for the printer at least as early as March 9, 1925. He states in his affidavit that on that day he told respondent's counsel that the brief had been prepared and that it would be sent to the printer. And yet no attempt was made to print it until after respondent had served his notice of motion to dismiss the appeal—an unexplained delay of at least two weeks in merely sending copy to the printer. No showing is made which even tends to excuse appellants' long-continued default, and it is respondent's right to have his motion granted.

The appeal is dismissed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. July 27, 1925. Rehearing Denied Aug. 26, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 24, 1925.)

1. Prohibition ⟸10(2) — Plea of immunity from service of process of state courts does not deprive superior court of jurisdiction.

A father brought habeas corpus for custody of minor child while mother and child were at liberty on bail pending determination of immigration proceedings, and mother prayed writ of prohibition against prosecution of habeas corpus proceeding, on ground that she was immune from service of process of state court. Held, that since plea of immunity did not deprive superior court of jurisdiction, but merely furnished ground for abatement if not waived, prohibition would not lie.

2. Prohibition ⟸10(1)—Superior court will not be prohibited from determining issue within its jurisdiction.

Writ of prohibition will not be granted to prohibit superior court from determining an issue legally within its power to determine, and properly brought before it.

Application of Hilda Betty Cooke for writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco and Hon. J. J. Trabucco, Judge thereof, to restrain further hearing of habeas corpus proceeding. Writ denied.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin and Archibald M. Johnson, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Annette A. Adams, Charles N. Douglas, and Joseph A. McCaffrey, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

KNIGHT, J. Prohibition. Petitioner seeks to prohibit the superior court of the state of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, department 12 thereof, and the Honorable J. J. Trabucco, judge presiding, from further hearing or determining a proceeding in habeas corpus now pending before said superior court, involving the custody of Shirley Cooke, a minor child of the age of 5½ years.

The facts are as follows: James H. Cooke and Hilda Betty Cooke are husband and wife and are the parents of said Shirley Cooke, all of whom are subjects of Great Britain, and, until recently, resided in the province of Ontario, Canada.

It is in substance alleged by the father of said child, in his petition for the writ of habeas corpus, that under Canadian law he has been declared the custodian of said child, and that during the month of January, 1925, the mother kidnapped said child, in said province of Ontario, Canada, and unlawfully brought her to the United States.

In the return to said writ of habeas corpus filed by the mother of said child, it is, in effect, alleged that on June 7, 1925, at the instance of the father, in the city of Reno, state of Nevada, she and the child were arrested pursuant to a federal warrant issued by the immigration service of the department of labor of the United States government; that after certain proceedings were had in the state of Nevada (the purpose and effect of which are unimportant here), and in order to expedite the matter of the hearing of said immigration proceedings, she surrendered herself and child into the custody of the immigration officials of San Francisco, where said immigration proceedings were made returnable and were required to be heard and determined. Later she and the child were released on bail, and, while at liberty on bail awaiting the hearing and determination of said immigration proceedings, this writ of habeas corpus was applied for and issued, upon the petition of the father, who seeks thereby to regain the custody of said child. All of these facts and circumstances are in detail set forth in said return, and upon these facts thus alleged, and the evidence adduced in support thereof, the mother of the child claims that she and the child were immune from the service upon them of process issued out of the state courts. Fox v. Hale & Norcross, 108 Cal. 369, 41 P. 308; Hammons v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. App. 700, 219 P. 1037: Filer v. McCornick (D. C.) 260 F. 309; Central Ry. Co. v. Jackson (D. C.) 238 F. 625; Stratton v. Hughes (D. C.) 211 F. 557.

[1] The sole question presented by this proceeding in prohibition, however, is one purely of jurisdiction; that is, whether or not, on account of said claim of immunity having been made in said habeas corpus proceeding, and (we will assume) having been established by evidence, said superior court is now proceeding without or in excess of jurisdiction. Our conclusion is that the question must be answered in the negative. It has been uniformly held in apparently all of the jurisdictions wherein this question has arisen that, if such immunity be seasonably and properly asserted, it serves as sufficient grounds for abatement of the proceeding, or upon which the service of the process may be set aside (Thornton v. American Writing Machine Co., 83 Ga. 288, 9 S. E. 679, 20 Am. St. Rep, 320), but that the proceeding out of which the alleged illegal process was issued is not void, nor is the service itself of the process a nullity, but that such immunity is only a privilege which may or may not be claimed, and that under certain circumstances is held to be waived (Smith v. Jones, 76 Me. 138, 49 Am. Rep. 598; Wood v. Kinsman, 5 Vt. 588; Petrie v. Fitzgerald, 1 Daly [N. Y.] 401; Cooper v. Wyman, 122 N. C. 784, 29 S. E. 947, 65 Am. St. Rep. 731; Massey v. Colville, 45 N. J. Law, 119, 46 Am. Rep. 754; In re Hall [D. C.] 296 F. 780, 782; Thornton v. Am. Writing Mach. Co., 83 Ga. 288, 9 S. E. 679, 20 Am. St. Rep. 320; McCullough v. McCullough, 203 Mich. 288, 168 N. W. 929; Tiedemann v. Tiedemann [Sup.] 156 N. Y. S. 109; Austin, etc., Road Co. v. Owen, 41 S. D. 110, 168 N. W. 860; Sebring v. Stryker, 10 Misc. Rep. 289, 30 N. Y. S. 1053).

[2] There can be no doubt but that the superior court, upon the filing of the father's petition in habeas corpus, the legal sufficiency of which petition is not questioned, was clothed with full and complete power to hear and determine the proceeding initiated by it—indeed it was its duty to do so; and it is manifest from the rule established by the numerous authorities hereinabove cited that the mere assertion of a claim of immunity did not ipso facto stay the proceeding or divest said court of jurisdiction, but, being in its nature a plea in abatement, said claim of immunity simply raised before said superior court an issue of fact as to the matters therein pleaded, and which, if established, would doubtless operate to abate the proceeding. But jurisdiction to hear and determine that issue was necessarily retained by the tribunal to which the plea was addressed and before which the issue was pending. It follows that prohibition does not lie to prevent that tribunal from exercising, in that respect, its lawful jurisdiction. Moreover, the petition in the instant proceeding does not allege that the court before which said issue is pending has even indicated that it is going to decide said issue adversely to the mother's claim; the allegation of the petition in this respect being:

"That said superior court intends to proceed further with said habeas corpus proceeding; that, unless this honorable court arrests said proceeding of said superior court, the petitioner and her said child and said Anna Bowman (the grandmother of said child) will be irreparably injured." (Italics ours.)

However, it appears that petitioner having urged upon said superior court a plea, founded upon allegations of fact, which, if true, would, it is claimed, operate to abate the proceeding filed against her, now seeks by this proceeding to prohibit said court from giving its decision upon the very issue of fact thus presented for decision. The inconsistency of petitioner's position seems self-evident. Even though it were alleged that said superior court had declared its intention of deciding adversely upon that issue and that such decision, if so rendered, would be in contravention of the law, it would not furnish grounds for interference on prohibition, for the reason that said superior court would still be acting entirely within its jurisdiction in determining an issue legally within its power to determine, and which had been properly brought before it. Prohibition is not available to restrain a subordinate court from deciding erroneously. Van Hoosear v. Railroad Com., 189 Cal. 228, 207 P. 903; High on Extraordinary Remedies, p. 772. It lies only when such tribunal is entertaining a proceeding of which it has no jurisdiction, or where it is assuming to exercise an unauthorized power in a cause or proceeding of which it has jurisdiction. 21 Cal. Jur. 584; Day v. Superior Court, 61 Cal. 489; Coker v. Superior Court, 58 Cal. 177.

The writ is denied.

DIXON v. DIXON. (Civ. 4215.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 30, 1925.)

1. Divorce ⟸51—Condoned divorce cause may be revived.

Where in a divorce action neither party obtained a decree, but wife was granted alimony, a subsequent living together of the parties, if a condonation, was revoked by later acts constituting a like cause for divorce, under Civ. Code, § 121, and order in first action remained in force.

2. Divorce ⟸231, 245(1)—Alimony may be awarded, though wife does not prevail; alimony may be modified as conditions warrant under statute.

Under Civ. Code, § 136, court may order payment of alimony, though wife does not prevail in suit, and such order may be modified and enforced as conditions warrant.

3. Divorce ⟸82—Prior divorce action still pending bar to second action, where relief asked may be obtained in first action.

Divorce action, denying parties' divorce, but granting wife alimony, which is still pending, is a bar to a second action for same relief, under rule that a prior suit bars a second suit, where relief sought is obtainable in first action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Suit for divorce by Maude S. Dixon against John T. Dixon. From a judgment allowing the plaintiff temporary alimony and attorney fees, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lawrence L. Larrabee, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The parties to this proceeding intermarried in October, 1913, and still are husband and wife. They separated on or about June 23, 1918, and on August 14, 1919, the husband commenced an action for divorce, wherein the wife filed an answer and cross-complaint, praying a decree dissolving the bonds of matrimony, and for attorneys' fees and costs. The cause was tried, and an interlocutory decree of divorce was denied either party, but a minute order was made that the husband pay to the defendant and cross-complainant "alimony $40 a month until further order of court." Such order was never entered in the form of a judgment, but the parties continued living apart, and monthly payments were made as directed, to and including December, 1921. Some time after the trial Dixon commenced persuasive methods in an attempt to induce his wife to return to him, as a result of which, upon consideration of his entreaties, she finally consented, and on or about January 13, 1922, she rejoined him. The parties lived together until April 4, 1922, when they again separated, but payments of said allowance were not resumed, though the original order remains upon the minutes of the court.

On June 8, 1922, the respondent commenced this action against appellant, charging that he had treated her with extreme cruelty during her second attempt to live with him, and praying judgment for separate maintenance, and for moneys to defray alleged necessary medical expenses, and for attorneys' fees and costs herein. Appellant answered, denying the allegations of her complaint, and affirmatively alleging the pendency of the divorce action and the order for alimony to be a bar to the subsequent suit. Order to show cause was issued, in response to which each of the parties appeared and testified, and appellant introduced the pleadings and orders of the first suit. Thereupon the trial court ordered that "the plea in abatement not proven, and disallows the same," and directed that the defendant pay to the plaintiff pending trial the sum of $15 weekly, besides attorneys' fees and costs.

The defendant appeals "from the judgment and order allowing alimony and attorneys' fees," contending that the decision and order of the lower court in the second suit are contrary to law and not supported by sufficient evidence. The gist of appellant's argument is that no findings or judgment were filed in the original action, and that the same is therefore still pending; that the cross-complaint stating grounds for divorce was sufficient to support a judgment for alimony or maintenance, with or without divorce. It is asserted that the right to separate maintenance arises from the divorce statutes, and that had said minute order been, in fact, followed by the entry of judgment thereon, it would now constitute a complete bar to this action.

None of the evidence, other than the pleadings and orders above mentioned, are brought up on this appeal, and we are therefore not apprised of the grounds upon which the decree of divorce was denied to either party.

[1] There may be room for argument, and some doubt, as to whether the respondent's cause of action, if she had one as alleged in her cross-complaint in the divorce case, was condoned by the parties living together as husband and wife subsequently thereto. If it be assumed that such a condonation took place, it was revoked according to the allegations of respondent's complaint in the instant action by the appellant having committed acts constituting a like cause for divorce. Civil Code, § 121. Hence, it cannot be said that the order entered in the divorce action became unenforceable through condonation.

[2] On the other hand, it is quite reasonable to conclude that the wife did not establish a cause of action in support of the allegations of her cross-complaint in the first case. The court denied a decree of divorce to each of the parties. If this denial was due to the fact that her proof failed to show the defendant guilty of such acts alleged in her cross-complaint as would give her a right to a divorce, of course there was no misconduct to condone. Under section 136 of the Civil Code the court was authorized to make an order allowing the wife alimony, even though she did not establish her right to a divorce; but in that event she might at any time have appeared and secured such modification of the order allowing her alimony as the facts would warrant. There can be no doubt that the respondent had a full and complete remedy in her right to appear at any time in the divorce action and ask for such additional alimony as new conditions arising subsequently to the trial might warrant, or to enforce payment of the alimony which had been directed to be paid.

[3] The plea of a prior suit pending to abate a second action is limited to cases where the relief sought in the second action is obtainable in the first. If the allegations of the complaint in the instant case are true, the only relief to which respondent here would be entitled is that of an order for alimony, and this relief, as we have shown, she had already secured in the former action. If this suit could be maintained, in the case where a husband had been guilty of cruel treatment of his wife for years, she might divide the time up into a number of periods and bring a separate action for maintenance based upon his cruelty during each one. These and other considerations justify the rule which prohibits the bringing of a second action when a prior suit is pendng entitling the party suing to the same relief. We think that this defense advanced by the appellant is a bar to the instant suit.

In re JOHNSTON'S ESTATE. (L. A. 8395.)

1. Wills ⟸13(4)—Husband's consent to wife's will held not a consent to codicil substantially changing disposition of her property and reserving no benefit to him.

Consent by husband to will of wife, bequeathing part of her estate for charitable purposes, held given to particular will which reserved a benefit to him, and not to be a waiver of Civ. Code, § 1313, as to any different disposition of his wife's property, nor a consent to a codicil which substantially changed disposition of property and reserved no benefit to him.

2. Asylums ⟸2—Legislature may empower counties to establish county hospitals, etc., but legislative control of county asylum does not make it state institution.

Legislature may, in absence of constitutional restriction, empower counties to establish hospitals, dispensaries, etc., and to prescribe regulations for government thereof, but legislative control of a county asylum does not make it a state institution.

3. Wills ⟸13(2)—Bequest to county hospital held not bequest "to the state or any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state, or any state institution."

Wife's bequest to county hospital held not a bequest "to the state or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state, or any state institution," within exception to Civ. Code, § 1313, so as to obviate necessity of husband's consent thereto; Pol. Code, § 2145, enumerating various state hospitals, not mentioning county hospitals.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. P. Cary, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Susan Mary Gowan Johnston, also known as Susan M. Johnston, deceased. From a decree directing distribution, the people of the state of California and another appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 64 Cal. App. 197, 221 P. 382.

C. C. Kempley and Albert J. Lee, both of San Diego, for appellants.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for Executor Southern Trust & Commerce Bank.

Hamilton & Lindley, of San Diego, for respondent Edwin Reed.

LAWLOR, Acting C. J. The decedent above named died testate on November 1, 1922, at La Mesa, in the county of San Diego, being a resident of and leaving estate in said county. The will of said decedent was admitted to probate in the superior court of the county of San Diego on December 18, 1922, and the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank, named therein as such, was duly appointed executor of said will. Christopher J. Johnston, the husband of the decedent, survived her, but has, since her death, been adjudged incompetent; one Lincoln McMillan being the legally appointed guardian of his person and estate. By her will the decedent disposed of all her estate to the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank of San Diego in trust for the benefit of her husband. After specifying the trust upon which the trustee named was to hold the estate the will proceeded as follows:

"Item 4: After the decease of my husband, if he survive me, or if he should not survive me, and the said trust for him does not take effect, I direct my said trustee to dispose of the said trust estate and close this trust as follows: [Then follow numerous specific legacies to be paid by the trustee.] (f) The remainder and residue of the said trust estate, after payment of all expenses of closing the trust, I direct, my said trustee to pay over to the Fredericka Home for the Aged, at Chula Vista, California, a corporation organized under the laws of said state, to be used by it to create an endowment fund for said home to be known as the 'Gowan-Johnston Endowment Fund,' the principal of which shall be maintained intact, and the income from which shall be devoted to the support and general purposes and needs of said home. * * *"

Following the attestation clause of the will the husband of the decedent signed on the same day the will was executed the following statement:

"I, the undersigned Christopher J. Johnston, having been made fully acquainted with the above and foregoing will of my wife Susan Mary Gowan Johnston, and being fully advised, do hereby consent to the same and the whole thereof."

At a later date, to wit, June 26, 1922, a codicil in these terms was added to the will by the decedent:

"I, Susan Mary Gowan Johnston hereby revoke and cancel the bequest to the Fredericka Home for the Aged as written herein, and all relating to it. — * * * And I further name and appoint the San Diego County Hospital as residuary legatee under this codicil of June 26, 1922—And direct that the funds obtained from the residue of my estate be used for the purpose of a special ward or building for the necessary care and treatment of patients who prefer to pay for hospital services rather than accept charity, the fees to be moderate and within the means of working people to pay, while the care and treatment of such patients to be of the best."

A petition for final distribution was seasonably filed. Objections on behalf of the county of San Diego to the distribution of the estate as prayed for in the petition were filed by the district attorney of that county. The court, on July 11, 1924, made its decree in accordance with the petition. After providing for the trust created by the will and setting forth directions to guide the trustee in the conduct thereof, the decree of distribution declared, in part:

"6. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed, and this does order, adjudge and decree that if and to the extent that the effect of the codicil to the will of said Susan Mary Gowan Johnston, also known as Susan M. Johnston, deceased, set out in the finding numbered 6 of the said findings of fact and conclusions of law heretofore filed herein, results in a devise and bequest, or devise or bequest, to charities or in trust for charitable uses, which collectively exceed one-third of the net distributable estate of the testatrix, such disposition to charitable purposes in excess of one-third of the distributable estate of said testatrix is null and void and a violation of section 1313 of the Civil Code of California, and that to that extent an intestacy has resulted and that the provisions in said codicil contained in favor of the San Diego County Hospital as residuary legatee of said decedent do not in law constitute a bequest or devise to the state or any state institution or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution within the exception from the restrictions of said section 1313 of the Civil Code of California."

It is then provided in the decree the method to be employed by the trustee to determine whether or not the residuary bequest to the San Diego County Hospital does in fact constitute a disposition in excess of one-third the value of the distributable estate and then declares that "as to the amount of such excess an intestacy shall be deemed to exist and such excess shall be deemed to belong to the heirs at law of said Susan Mary Gowan Johnston, deceased, and be disbursed and paid by said trustee in the following manner:" (The part thereof to be distributed to each heir of decedent then being set forth.)

Thereafter the people of the state of California and the county of San Diego filed this appeal "from that part of the decree of distribution entered herein on the 18th day of July, 1924, which adjudges and decrees that the County Hospital of the county of San Diego is not a state institution and that the legacy bequeathed to said institution by the codicil to the will of said decedent fails in so far as said legacy exceeds one-third of the distributable estate of said decedent, being that portion of the decree contained in paragraphs six and seven thereof."

Section 1313, Civil Code, provides:

"No estate, real or personal, shall be bequeathed or devised to any charitable or benevolent society or corporation, or to any person or persons in trust for charitable uses, except the same be done by will duly executed at least thirty days before the decease of the testator; and if so made at least thirty days prior to such death, such devise or legacy and each of them shall be valid; provided, that no such devise or bequest shall collectively exceed one-third of the estate of the testator, leaving legal heirs, and in such case a pro rata deduction from such devises or bequests shall be made so as to reduce the aggregate thereof to one-third of such estate; and all dispositions of property made contrary hereto shall be void, and go to the residuary legatee or devisee, next of kin, or heirs, according to law; and provided, further, that bequests and devises to the state, or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution, or to any educational institution which is exempt from taxation under section one a of article thirteen of the constitution of the state of California, or for the use or benefit of any such educational institution, are excepted from the restrictions of this section; provided, however, that nothing in this section contained shall apply to bequests or devises made by will executed at least six months prior to the death of a testator who leaves no parent, husband, wife, child or grandchild, or when all of such heirs shall have by writing, executed at least six months prior to his death, waived the restriction contained herein."

Appellants state that—

"By this appeal two questions are presented for decision:

"(1) The husband having waived the restrictions imposed by section 1313 of the Civil Code, at the time of the execution of the original will, was it necessary to the validity of the change of charitable beneficiary, as made by the codicil, that he again waive said restrictions?

"(2) Was the bequest contained in the codicil, one to a state institution or for the use or benefit of the state?"

Under the first contention it is urged by the appellants that—

"The written consent of Mr. Johnston to the original will, containing a residuary bequest to a corporation for charitable uses, was a consent to bequeath the residue of the estate in trust for charitable purposes and a waiver of the restrictions imposed by section 1313 of the Civil Code. * * *

"The waiver was written on the will itself just below the attestation of the witnesses to the will and was general in terms. You cannot read into the waiver any condition or limitation. The only logical construction of the waiver is that the husband consented to the making of a will whereby more than one-third of the estate would become a trust fund for charitable uses. This consent, having been given more than six months prior to the death of the testator [testatrix?] was sufficient to validate any bequest contained in the will and any thereafter provided for."

[1] In our opinion a reading of the consent or so-called "waiver" makes clear that the contention is without merit. It signifies merely a consent to the will as then written, and in no reasonable sense can it be held to constitute a general waiver of the rights and benefits secured to heirs by the provisions of section 1313, Civil Code. As stated by the respondent:

"Taking into consideration the language used in the consent in question, the construction placed on section 1313 by the courts, and upon similar statutes in other states, the only logical conclusion to be reached is that the consent given by Mr. Johnston to the will of his wife was given to the particular will which reserved a benefit to Mr. Johnston, and that consent cannot be construed as a waiver of the provisions of C. C. 1313 as to any different disposition of his wife's property, nor as a consent to the codicil here, which substantially changed the disposition of the property and reserved no benefit to Mr. Johnston."

We quote from appellants' brief touching their second contention:

"The bequest to the county hospital * * * was a valid bequest for the reason that the county hospital is a state institution and the trust created was for the benefit of the state, and for the further reason that the Legislature has authorized counties to accept bequests and hold and use the same for the purposes prescribed by the terms of the bequest."

Hereunder, it is urged that one of the primary duties of a state is to care for the indigent sick, and that the Legislature has, by the various county government acts and other measures, authorized, if not compelled, the several counties to assume their proper share of this public duty. Again quoting from appellants' brief:

"It thus appears that the state has continuously undertaken to provide for the care of the indigent sick of the state. At times it has done so by delegating to the counties the duty of providing hospitals and caring for the poor without supervision by any other state agency, but since 1903 this delegated duty has also been supervised and controlled by a state agency and by the Governor of the state. The power to build county hospitals and almshouses cannot now be exercised by the board of supervisors without the sanction of the state board of charities.

"Legislative control over institutions for the care of indigent sick as expressed by the provisions of the above-mentioned enactments fixes the character of such institutions as state institutions maintained for the purpose of carrying on the work of the state. * * *"

[2] In 5 McQuillan on Municipal Corporations, § 2458, the rule is thus stated:

"The Legislature may, in the absence of constitutional restriction, empower municipalities to establish municipal hospitals, dispensaries, asylums, poor houses and other charitable institutions to care for the sick, dependent, neglected, destitute, insane or poor, and to prescribe regulations for the government thereof, and such power is usually conferred. * * * The fact that a municipal asylum is subject to legislative control does not make it a state institution."

No reason suggests itself why a different principle should be applied to similar county institutions.

The case of Chalfant v. State, 37 Ohio St. 60, 61, involved the question whether or not Longview Asylum, founded by Hamilton county under acts of the General Assembly, was a state institution within the meaning of an article of the Ohio state Constitution, which required the trustees of such institutions to be appointed by the governor. The court declared, in part:

"The constitutional provision evidently refers to institutions belonging to and owned by the state, and not to such as might belong to particular municipalities or counties, though established under the legislative authority of the state. * * *

"The grounds upon which it is claimed to be a state institution are that the state has contributed to its support; that it is governed by the laws of the state; and, moreover, that it is made the duty of the state by the Constitution, to foster and support institutions for the benefit of the insane, blind, deaf, and dumb.

"While it is true this duty is imposed on the state, yet, it is left to the wisdom of the general assembly to determine the character of the institutions through which the benefit is to be conferred.

"There is no constitutional inhibition against authorizing a county, or the municipalities of the state establishing such institutions. All institutions for these purposes are not required to be state institutions; but when state institutions are created for the purpose, the Constitution requires the trustees to be appointed in the mode therein provided.

"The provision has no application to institutions for these purposes founded by individuals, or particular localities, under authority granted for the purpose. Nor do such institutions become state institutions from the fact that they are subject to legislative government and control. All institutions and corporations created for public purposes are subject to be thus governed.

"Nor is the character of the institution affected by the fact that the Legislature has contributed to its support. The institution was created to administer in a particular county a public charity, which the state is enjoined to foster, and there is no inhibition against the general assembly giving it such aid as it may deem just."

This definition of "state institution" seems to have been approved in Estate of Houk, 186 Cal. 643, 646, 200 P. 417, 418, wherein, in passing upon the question whether or not a bequest to a municipality for the construction and maintenance of a pleasure pier was a charitable bequest within the meaning of section 1313, the court declared:

"In Chalfant v. State, 37 Ohio St. 60, state institutions are defined as institutions belonging to and owned by the state and not such as might belong to particular municipalities."

Moreover, it is significant to note that section 2145 of the Political Code enumerates the various state hospitals. Obviously, if county hospitals were intended to be state institutions, they would appear or be referred to in this section of the Political Code.

Nor do we think the residuary bequest in the instant case to the County Hospital of San Diego county comes within the exception contained in the phrase "for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution" found in section 1313, for, as said in Estate of Houk, supra:

"It cannot be disputed that anything in the way of municipal improvement which benefits the municipality benefits the state as a whole. This would be the case were the beneficiary of that aid a private hospital, or charity of any kind which helped to carry the public burden, but that is obviously not what is meant by this provision of section 1313. When it is read with its context it will be apparent that the words 'state' and 'state institution' are to be read in the clause referred to precisely in the sense used in the preceding clause as referring to bequests directly to the state or in trust for the benefit of the state; directly to, or in trust for the benefit of, any state institution."

Furthermore, as suggested in Estate of Houk, supra, if the Legislature had intended to include municipal or county institutions within the exceptions to the provisions of section 1313, Civil Code, it would have expressly so provided.

[3] As indicated, we conclude that the bequest here to the County Hospital of San Diego county is not a bequest "to the state, or to any state institution, or for the use or benefit of the state or any state institution," so as to come within the exception to the provisions of section 1313 of the Civil Code.

The decree of distribution is affirmed.

JOHNSON v. SCHIMPF. (Sac. 3627.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟹351(1)—Allegations of complaint for breach of contract to convey held to limit recovery under statute for damages for vendor's bad faith.

In action for breach of contract to convey land, where there were no allegations in complaint showing payment or part payment of purchase price, nor expenditures incurred in examination of title, plaintiff's recovery under Civ. Code, § 3306, is limited to damages under clause providing that, in case of bad faith, damages were to be the difference between price agreed to be paid and value of the estate agreed to be conveyed at time of the breach and expenses incurred in preparing to enter the land,

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟹349—Allegations in complaint for breach of contract held to clearly and indubitably indicate bad faith of vendor.

In action for breach of contract to convey realty, where complaint set out facts showing material representations by defendant to plaintiff, and reliance thereon by plaintiff in expending money, held that the complaint clearly and indubitably indicated bad faith of vendor.

3. Pleading ⟹9—Bad faith of defaulting vendor in contract to convey realty need not be specifically alleged under statute.

Bad faith of defaulting vendor in contract to convey real property need not be specifically alleged in order to make cause of action under last provision of Civ. Code, § 3306; it being sufficient if ultimate facts are pleaded from which bad faith may be deduced.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟹349—Cause of action for failure to convey realty held stated within provisions of statute.

In action for damages for breach of contract to convey realty, held that a cause of action was stated by the complaint within the provisions of Civ. Code, § 3306.

5. Evidence ⟹460(3)—Vendor and purchaser ⟹22—Less strictness in description of property demanded in contract for sale than in deed of conveyance, and parol evidence admissible to identify property.

Less strictness in the description of property is demanded in contract than in deed of conveyance, and, in the construction of executory contracts for sale of realty, courts are liberal in their construction to give effect to intent of parties, and extrinsic and parol evidence may be resorted to as a means of ascertaining and identifying property in question.

6. Evidence ⟹460(3)—Land in contract for sale held sufficiently identified by occupancy, and parol evidence admissible to aid description.

In action for breach of contract to convey realty, held that the description sufficiently identified the property in controversy by occupancy, and parol evidence could be introduced in aid thereof.

7. Estoppel ⟹83(1)—One intentionally inducing another to believe certain facts to his prejudice estopped to deny same.

It is elementary that, where one by his acts, representations, or admissions intentionally induces another to believe certain facts to exist, and latter without fault, in reliance thereon, will be materially prejudiced if the former is permitted to deny such facts, the one making the representations is estopped from denying same.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Estoppel.]

8. Estoppel ⟹83(2)—Owner of property, clothing another with ostensible authority to dispose of same, leading third parties to act in reliance thereon, is precluded thereafter from setting up ownership.

Where the owner of property clothes another with ostensible authority to dispose of same, and innocent third parties are thereby led or induced to act on such representations, the real owner is precluded thereafter from setting up his ownership to their detriment.

9. Estoppel ⟹107—If allegations of complaint are tantamount to allegations of estoppel, it is well pleaded.

It is a general rule of pleading that, if the allegations of a complaint are tantamount to an allegation of estoppel, it is well pleaded, though there be no specific allegations of estoppel.

10. Estoppel ⟹107—Complaint in action for breach of contract of sale of realty held to state sufficient facts upon which estoppel may be predicated.

In action for breach of contract for the sale of realty, held that the complaint stated sufficient facts upon which an estoppel may be predicated, and to state cause of action against defendant.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by J. W. Johnson against Marie Schimpf. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action was brought to recover damages, alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff, because of the breach by the defendant of a contract to convey real property. The court below sustained a general demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint without leave to amend. Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from this judgment.

The pleaded facts in the case, substantially stated, are these: The defendant was the owner of certain real property upon which were situated certain designated buildings, consisting of slaughter houses, sheds, and corrals, which constituted the appurtenances of a slaughter house business. One Venters was in possession of said buildings; he claimed to own the same, and represented to the plaintiff herein that he had the right to sell and dispose of them. Plaintiff desired to purchase these buildings, provided he could purchase the land upon which they stood. Defendant, knowing these facts, represented to plaintiff that said Venters had the right to sell the buildings and deliver possession to plaintiff. Defendant then entered into an agreement with plaintiff to sell the said real property upon which the buildings were situated at a stated price, when the plaintiff should acquire the said buildings from Venters. Relying upon this agreement with defendant, plaintiff, with the knowledge and consent of defendant, and believing defendant would convey the said land as agreed, purchased the said buildings and appurtenances from said Venters, paying $4,000 therefor, and took possession of said land and buildings with the knowledge and consent of defendant. Within four days subsequent thereto, when called upon by plaintiff to perform her agreement, defendant repudiated the same and refused to make the agreed conveyance of the land. Thereafter defendant set up her ownership of the buildings and demanded rent from plaintiff and threatened him with arrest if any attempt were made to remove the said buildings; whereupon plaintiff relinquished possession to defendant.

[1-3] The provisions of section 3306 of the Civil Code, after prescribing the ordinary measure of damages in an action to recover for breach of contract to convey realty, specifically declare that, in addition thereto, the measure of damages shall be: "In case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land." For the purposes of this appeal, plaintiff may be considered as being in the analogous situation to one who had actually placed the improvements upon the land in reliance on the defendant's promise to make a conveyance. There are no allegations in the complaint showing payment or part payment of the purchase price of said land, nor of any expenditures incurred in examination of the title. Plaintiff's recovery is therefore limited by the concluding clause of section 3306 of the Civil Code. In order, therefore, to make out a cause of action, it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to allege bad faith in the defendant's refusal to convey the land in question. The complaint in the instant case sets out facts showing that the defendant had made certain material representations to plaintiff, believing that plaintiff would act on same; that plaintiff thereafter, in reliance on said representations, did act and expend money; that defendant, without just cause, repudiated her agreement and refused to make the promised conveyance. The alleged willful, unwarranted default of the defendant, without just cause, is a clear and indubitable indication of her bad faith. It is consonant with the general rules of pleading, to set out facts which of themselves necessarily imply bad faith. Osborne v. Clark, 60 Cal. 622; Anderson v. Bank, 140 Cal. 695, 74 P. 287.

This court, although never having had the occasion to pass upon the precise point presented here, has uniformly held that bad faith in a defaulting vendor, in a contract to convey real property, need not be specially alleged in order to make out a cause of action under the last provision of section 3306 of the Civil Code. If the ultimate facts are pleaded from which the bad faith of the vendor is a necessary deduction, the complaint will suffice to state a cause of action. Morgan v. Stearns, 40 Cal. 434; Clark v. Yocum, 116 Cal. 515, 48 P. 498; Shaw v. Union Escrow Co., 53 Cal. App. 66, 200 P. 25. Bad faith was implied from the pleaded facts in Morgan v. Stearns, supra, although the complaint did not expressly and specifically allege bad faith in the defaulting vendor. In Clark v. Yocum, supra, there was no express allegation of defendants' bad faith, and it was held that, inasmuch as the defendants had agreed to convey certain water rights and privileges to plaintiffs, who had paid the purchase price therefor, it was bad faith on the part of the defendants, within the meaning of section 3306, Civil Code, to refuse without just cause or excuse to perform their contract. In Shaw v. Union Escrow Co., supra, an attack was made upon the sufficiency of the pleading to raise the issue of bad faith. The court said:

"Appellant makes the further contention that the complaint in the action did not state facts sufficient to present the issue as to the bad faith of defendant. The complaint did allege the making of the contract, the breach thereof, the value of the property at the time of the breach and that the defendant 'without any just cause or just excuse' refused to make conveyance of the property."

The court also said:

"* * * It is not necessary, in order to establish bad faith within the meaning of section 3306 of the Civil Code, that the vendor be shown to have refused to go on with the transaction because of some gain which would accrue to him. It is sufficient if he refuses to convey, where through his own negligence he has put it out of his power to fulfill the obligations of his contract."

[4] The complaint in the instant case having alleged facts which necessarily compel the deduction of bad faith on the part of the defendant, it must be held that a cause of action was stated within the provisions of section 3306 of the Civil Code.

[5] Respondent by special demurrer challenges the sufficiency of the complaint on two additional grounds, namely, the inadequacy of the description of the land agreed to be conveyed, and the failure to allege by what right Venters sold and disposed of the said buildings and appurtenances situated upon the land. There is no merit in either of these objections. It is now the general and well-established rule that less strictness in the description of property is demanded in a contract than in a deed of conveyance. In the construction of executory contracts of sale of real estate, courts have been most liberal, and have sought, as far as consistent with established rules, to give effect to the intention of the parties in applying descriptions of property. The usual rigid construction given to deeds has not been adhered to in the character of contracts under consideration here. The description may be supplemented by extrinsic evidence showing its application to particular property to the exclusion of all other property. Parol evidence is ordinarily admissible to show what property the parties intended to convey, and it will be deemed that a contract adequately describes the property if it refers to something which is certain or provides a means of ascertaining and identifying the property which is the subject-matter of the contract. Preble v. Abrahams, 88 Cal. 245, 26 P. 99, 22 Am. St. Rep. 301; Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 202, 20 P. 386; Sparks v. Hess, 15 Cal. 186; Lange v. Waters, 156 Cal. 142, 103 P. 889, 19 Ann. Cas. 1207; Towle v. Carmelo L. & C. Co., 99 Cal. 397, 33 P. 1126; Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Estate of Garnier, 147 Cal. 457, 82 P. 68; Calif. Pack. Corp. v. Grove, 51 Cal. App. 253, 196 P. 891.

[6] A scrutiny of the description of the land in the instant case shows that the property in controversy is sufficiently identified by occupancy, viz. that portion occupied and upon which is located the slaughter house, sheds, corrals, and appurtenances. This description could be made more certain, if need be, by the introduction of parol evidence to show what portion the parties intended to be embraced in the parcel to be conveyed.

[7, 8] It was immaterial under the pleaded facts of the complaint whether Venters was the owner of the buildings or whether he was simply given the right to sell them under some agreement with defendant as her agent or otherwise. The salient, outstanding fact, according to the allegations of the complaint, is that Venters claimed the right to sell them, and respondent, being aware of appellant's desire to purchase them and the lot upon which they were situated, and intending that appellant should rely upon such information, represented to him that Venters did have such right of sale. Appellant alleges he did rely upon these representations as being true. It is elementary that where one by his acts, representations, or admissions intentionally induces another to believe certain facts to exist, and the latter, without fault, acts in reliance thereon so that he is materially prejudiced if the former is permitted to deny the existence of such facts, the one making the representations is estopped from denying same. Where the owner of property permits another person to be clothed with ostensible ownership or as having full power of disposition, and innocent third parties are thereby led or induced to act in reliance on such representations, the real owner is precluded from setting up his ownership thereafter to their detriment.

[9, 10] Although there are no specific allegations of estoppel, the allegations of the complaint clearly indicate a cause of action based upon estoppel. It is a general rule of pleading that, if the allegations of a complaint are tantamount to an allegation of estoppel, it is well pleaded. Smiley v. Read, 163 Cal. 644, 126 P. 486; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 677, 47 P. 695; Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, 70 P. 175; Davis v. Davis, 26 Cal. 23, 85 Am. Dec. 157; Palvutzian v. Terkanian, 47 Cal. App. 47, 190 P. 503; Roger v. Struven, 44 Cal. App. 528, 186 P. 817; Mills v. Jackson, 19 Cal. App. 695, 127 P. 655. The plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts upon which estoppel may be predicated, and consequently the complaint sufficiently states a cause of action against the defendant upon the theory that having confirmed plaintiff in the belief that Venters was the owner of and had the right to sell the buildings, the defendant is precluded, if the allegations of the complaint be true—and they must be taken to be true for the purposes of demurrer—from denying that Venters had the right to sell the buildings. Respondent's other objections are nonsubstantial.

The judgment is reversed.

In re BERNARD'S ESTATE.

DONAHUE et al. v. POCHIN et al.

(L. A. 8444.)

1. Wills ⟸133—Signature in exordium clause only not sufficient signing to make document a will.

A signature in exordium clause of an alleged holographic will, abruptly terminating in middle of last page, indicating intention to do something additional, and containing no other signature, is not a sufficient signing to make document a will, but is regarded merely as descriptio personæ.

2. Wills ⟸133—Signature in exordium clause of holographic document held not executing signature, despite words "following four sheets included."

Signature in exordium clause of holographic document of four pages is not regarded as an executing signature for a will, despite opening words "the following four sheets included," since they do not warrant inference of intent to make an executing signature.

3. Wills ⟸132—Holographic document not a valid will, where place intended as a part of will was printed.

A holographic document, written on hotel stationery, containing printed words of place of writing, intended to be made an essential part of document, is invalid as not executed according to Civ. Code, § 1277, requiring such documents to be entirely written by hand of testator.

4. Wills ⟸386—Execution of will, question of fact for determination of trial court, sustained, unless unsupported by evidence.

The due execution of a will is a question of fact, and its determination by trial court will be sustained, unless unsupported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Josephine Bernard, deceased. Petition by Jessie Bernard Donahue and others and Jane B. McKinley, as administratrix with will annexed of the estate of Josephine Bernard, deceased, for probate of last will and testament of Josephine Bernard, deceased, against Mary E. Pochin and others. From an order revoking the probate of a certain document holographic in form, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Stewart & Stewart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Merriam, Rinehart & Merriam, of Pasadena, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This appeal is taken from an order revoking the probate of a certain document, holographic in form, theretofore admitted to probate as the last will and testament of Josephine Bernard, deceased. The order of the lower court revoking the probate of the alleged will rests upon two grounds: (1) That it was not signed by the decedent; (2) that it was not entirely written by the decedent as required by section 1277 of the Civil Code.

The document in question consists of four sheets of hotel stationery. The first page, as it appears in a photostatic copy incorporated in the record, is as follows:

"The following 4 sheets of paper included, Long Beach, California, Oct. 12, 1918.
"I, Josephine Bernard of the City and County of Denver, Colo. do hereby declare this to be my last will and testament."

This is followed by a number of dispositive clauses, and then the document terminates abruptly near the middle of the last page in the following language:

"To her husband Herbert Donahue ruby and diamond stick pin."

It is a conceded fact in the case that the document in question was in the handwriting of the decedent, save the words in the date line, "Long Beach, California," which were printed. The only question here presented is whether the document is entirely written and signed by the hand of the decedent.

[1] The rule governing what constitutes a sufficient signing of a holographic will is enunciated in Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227, where the only signature in the document offered for probate was in the opening clause, and commenced in terms similar to those of the document in the instant case, and ended without any signature other than the one at the beginning. There was nothing on the face of the will to indicate that the testatrix intended to adopt the signature in the introduction as her signature in execution of the will. The court held:

"* * * A document in which the name of the person making it appears only in the beginning thereof, and by way of recital to designate that person as the maker * * * cannot be said to have been signed by the maker."

On this subject the court laid down the general rule in the following language:

"The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears. If placed elsewhere, it is for the court to say, from an inspection of the whole document, its language as well as its form, and the relative position of its parts, whether or not there is a positive and satisfactory inference from the document itself that the signature was so placed with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution. If such inference thus appears, the execution may be considered as proven by such signature."

This rule was approved in the Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778, and in Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 191 P. 16. It was affirmed in Estate of Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 174 P. 669. In Estate of McMahon, supra, the signature was in the exordium of the will, which was followed by a number of dispositive clauses, and concluded with the following:

"I do hereby publish and declare the foregoing, entirely written, dated and signed by my own hand, to be my last will and testament, this second day of January, 1912."

No signature followed nor was any to be found in any other part of the will except in the exordium. It was held, nevertheless, that this was a declaration of the intent of testatrix to adopt the name appearing in the exordium as her signature, and accordingly the validity of the will was upheld. In Estate of Streeton, supra, the court said, after reiterating the rule above stated in Estate of Manchester:

"The name of the testator appears in a blank space, disconnected from the rest of the written matter both as to location and meaning. Had the name appeared in the exordium, the logical inference from the context would probably have been that it was intended merely to identify the person making the will, and additional facts might have been necessary to raise the inference that it was also intended as a signature in execution of the will. Estate of Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 174 P. 669; Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778."

The same rule was applied in the Estate of Hurley, supra, as the test in determining whether an alleged will had been signed within the meaning of section 1277 of the Civil Code. In that case, in the document under consideration, as in the instant case, the name of the decedent appeared only in the introductory clause, and there, as here, the instrument closed abruptly without anything to indicate upon the face of the document that the signature in the exordium was adopted or intended to be adopted as the executing signature. Said the court in the case last cited:

"* * * The signature appears in the opening statement of the paper, but there is nothing in the document or in the closing paragraph to indicate that the testatrix intended to adopt that signature as the executing signature of the will. Indeed, the contrary may be inferred from the fact that the will terminates without even a punctuation mark, thereby indicating that the testatrix ceased writing before she had completed declaring her intention and that she did not regard the document as a completed will. But the contrary inference need not appear. In the absence of anything on the face of the will to raise the inference that the name in the exordium was intended as a signature in execution, the holographic document cannot be deemed a valid will."

[2] Marking and measuring the document in question by the above-stated "true rule," which has been so often reaffirmed and approved by this court, there is no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, that there was no executing signature sufficient to give legal effect as a will to the document. There is no signature at the end of the document, where it is the common custom to place a signature intended for authenticating and indicating the completion of an instrument. The signature of the decedent appears only in the exordium, and there is nothing in any other part of the alleged will to indicate affirmatively or by necessary implication that the signature was intended to be or was adopted as the final executing signature in authentication of or in execution of the document as a completed testamentary act. The obvious and natural inference to be drawn from the position of the name of the decedent in the alleged will is that it was intended merely as descriptio personæ, and, in the absence of anything affirmatively appearing on the face of the will itself tending to show that such signature was intended to authenticate it, this conclusion is inevitable. This is so notwithstanding the fact that decedent wrote at the very beginning of the document the words and figure, "The following 4 sheets of paper included." These words indicate merely that decedent contemplated making the document her will, but they do not, standing alone, warrant the inference of an intent to adopt the signature in the exordium as her executing signature; nor are they so intimately connected with the context of the document, as was the situation in the estate of McMahon, supra, as to justify the inference that she intended such signature to be in authentication of the document as her will. The abrupt termination of the document near the middle of the last page is a strong indication of decedent's intent to do something more in order to make it a complete will. The last clause being, in all general respects, similar to the preceding dispositive clauses manifests that the writer did not intend to terminate the document finally and definitely at that particular point, but, rather, indicates that something additional was to be done, and necessarily compels the conclusion that decedent had no intention of adopting the name written in the opening clause of the will as the executing signature to her final testamentary act.

[3] In setting aside the order admitting the will to probate, the lower court did so upon the additional ground that it was not entirely written by the hand of the decedent. We are, then, upon this phase of the case, called upon to determine whether the document was executed in compliance with the essential requirements of the law. A holographic document to be given legal effect as a will must be, among other things, "entirely written * * * by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject to no other form." Civ. Code, § 1277; Estate of Rand, 61 Cal. 468, 44 Am. Rep. 555; Estate of Billings, 64 Cal. 427, 1 P. 701; Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 90 P. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Francis, 191 Cal. 600, 217 P. 746; Estate of Thorn, 183 Cal. 512, 192 P. 19.

In Estate of Thorn, supra, the document admitted to probate was, in all of its essential portions, written in the handwriting of the decedent except the word "Cragthorn," which was inserted in two different places in the body of the document with a rubber stamp. This court held that the alleged will was not executed in accordance with the mandatory requirements of the statute, and was for that reason invalid. The court stated:

"If the words 'Cragthorn' stamped with a rubber stamp upon this document, or either of them, constitute a part of the attempted will, it seems obvious that the will is not 'entirely written by the hand of the testator himself,' and therefore does not measure up to the mandatory requirements of the statute."

That decision governs and controls in the determination of the validity of the document now before us. The instrument in the present case, it seems to us, does not fulfill the statutory requirements, in that it is not "entirely written * * * by the hand of the testator himself." Civ. Code, § 1277. It will be noted that the clause, "the following 4 sheets of paper included," written at the top of the first page, is written immediately above the date line, and the written word "included" is carefully adapted to the alignment of the printed words, "Long Beach, California," on the date line of the letterhead. The day, the month, and the year are written with exactitude on the same line with and directly following the printed name of the place where the alleged will was executed. The printed words are incorporated in and doubtless were intended to be made a part of the heading of the document. The care with which the date has been placed upon the precise line with the printed words indicate that the words immediately preceding the date must have been intended to be made a part of the document as the name of the place of the execution of the document. Moreover, this construction, based upon the relative position of the words, is supported by the juxtaposition of the written word "included" and the printed words "Long Beach, California," which are in a direct and immediate line thereto. It thus appears that decedent not only wished to make the date a part of the document, but to make, also, the printed portion, designating the place of the making of the document, an essential part of the document. Unless it can be said that the clause at the very top of the will, which reads: "The following 4 sheets of paper included," is a material part and parcel of the will, then there is nothing on the face of the document which in any wise indicates that the testator had executed a completed instrument; and, if we take that clause to be a material part of the will, then we are confronted with the fact that the printed words "Long Beach, California," are likewise a material part and parcel of the will, and therefore it cannot be said, in keeping with the rule enunciated in the Estate of Thorn, supra, that the will was entirely written by the hand of the testator. This being so, we perforce reach the conclusion that the alleged will was not executed in accordance with the requirements of the law.

[4] The due execution of a will is a question of fact, and its determination by the trial court must be sustained, unless that determination is unsupported by the evidence. Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 191 P. 16; Ryder v. Bamberger, 172 Cal. 799, 158 P. 753; Rideout v. City of Los Angeles, 185 Cal. 434, 197 P. 74. The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re TRICKETT'S ESTATE. (L. A. 8339.)

1. Descent and distribution ⊜47(2) — That omission by testator of child or issue of deceased child from will was intentional must be established from will itself.

Under Civ. Code, § 1307, providing that, if testator omits to provide in will for children or issue of deceased children, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child or issue of such child has same rights as if he had died intestate, intention of testator to omit such children must be determined from will itself, and parol evidence must not be resorted to to show his intention.

2. Descent and distribution ⊜47(2)—To exclude testator's children or issue of deceased child from share in estate it must appear on face of will that omission therefrom was intentional, and words of will must show testator had such persons in mind and omitted them.

Under Civ. Code, § 1307, to exclude child of testator or issue of deceased child not mentioned in will from share in estate, it must appear on face of will, not only that omission was intentional, but words of will must show that testator had persons omitted in mind and omitted them from provisions of will.

3. Descent and distribution ⟸47(2) — Will construed to permit only testator's wife and his children living at his death to share estate.

Where residuary clause of will provided for division among testator's four children at his death, and if any of them should die, then to be divided among the rest living, and not their heirs, or any other relatives or friends of testator, only testator's wife, provided for by prior clause and his childen living at his death shared estate, and children of his deceased children did not participate therein, regardless of Civ. Code, § 1307, providing that on omission of testator to provide in will for any of children or issue of deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, child or issue of such child takes share he would have taken if testator had died intestate.

4. Wills ⟸502—Testator, excluding from participation in estate any other relatives than those designated, held to have used words "relatives" in legal sense.

Where testator, after making certain devises, in residuary devise, left property to his four children to be divided among them, if living at his death, and if any of them should die, to be divided between the rest living, and not their heirs or any other relatives of testator, he must be deemed to have used word "relatives" in its legal sense, which should be construed, unless contrary intention appears, as meaning those next of kin, who in case of intestacy would take under statutes of distribution.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Relation—Relative.]

5. Wills ⟸502—Word "relatives" or "relations" in devise or bequest means, unless contrary intention appears, those next of kin who, in case of intestacy, would take under statutes of distribution.

Word "relative" is ordinarily defined to mean one that is connected by blood, affinity, relation, and word "relatives" or "relations," when used in a devise or bequest, should be construed, unless a contrary intention appears, as meaning those next of kin who, in cases of intestacy, would take under statutes of distribution.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of A. G. Trickett, deceased. From a decree of distribution, Jessie Neva O'Dell and others appeal. Affirmed.

Benjamin P. Oakford, of Los Angeles, and Harry G. Kyle, of Kansas City, Mo., for appellants.

A. B. Taylor, of Whittier (Arthur G. Wray, of Whittier, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, J. A. G. Trickett died testate March 11, 1923, a resident of Whittier, Cal., and his olographic will was admitted to probate in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution. The decedent was survived by his widow, Addie G. Trickett; his four children, Mary P. Sidwell, Charles W. Trickett, Frances A. Nutt, and Maggie R. Shahan; his three grandchildren, Jessie Neva O'Dell, DeRoy Eugene Colt, and Demi Morgan Colt, the issue of two predeceased daughters of the decedent. The will purported to devise and to bequeath a life estate to testator's widow in certain real property and in certain outstanding obligations due to the testator, with remainder over to his four children. These bequests were supplemented by a general residuary clause which reads as follows:

"And all other property I may have & hold at that time (the time of his death) is to be divided amongst the four children mentioned if living at that time & if any of them should dye then to be divided between the rest living & not their heirs or any other relatives or friends of mine."

The will does not in terms mention or provide for the three grandchildren above mentioned. They are the appellants, and the point is made in their behalf that they, being among the heirs at law of the testator and he having failed to provide for them in his will or to indicate that such omission was intentional, are entitled under the provisions of section 1307 of the Civil Code to share in his estate, as if he had died intestate. That Code section provides:

"When any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, has the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate, and succeeds thereto as provided in the preceding section."

[1] The quoted Code section places a child and the issue of a deceased child in the same category, so that, if no provision be made for them in the will of a decedent, they are entitled to share in his estate the same as though no will had been made, unless it appears that such omission was intentional. The intention of the testator to omit such children must be determined from the terms of the will itself, and parol evidence may not be resorted to for the purpose of showing the intention of the testator. Estate of Stevens, 83 Cal. 322, 23 P. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252; Estate of Utz, 43 Cal. 200; Bush v. Lindsey, 44 Cal. 121; Estate of Wardell, 57 Cal. 484; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 645, 34 P. 513; In re Salmon, 107 Cal. 614, 40 P. 1030, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164.

[2] We are limited, therefore, to the terms of the will under consideration for the determination of the question of whether or not decedent intentionally omitted appellants, his heirs at law, from his will. It must appear upon the face of the will, not only that the omission was intentional, but "the words of the will must show that the testator has the persons omitted in his mind, and having them so in his mind, has omitted them from the provisions of the will." Estate of Lindsay, 176 Cal. 238, 168 P. 113; Estate of Minear, 180 Cal. 239, 180 P. 535; Estate of Callaghan, 119 Cal. 571, 51 P. 860, 39 L. R. A. 689; Estate of Hassell, 168 Cal. 287, 142 P. 838; Payne v. Payne, 18 Cal. 291. In Rhoton v. Blevin, supra, the testator was survived by his widow, four children and three grandchildren, the issue of two deceased daughters. The material portions of the will, among other things, provided:

"First knowing that my beloved wife, Ona Blevin, will ever continue the same kind, devoted mother to our children which she has so thoroughly proven herself on all occasions, I make no provisions for said children further than herein mentioned. * * *"

Although the testator did not refer to, or in any way designate, his grandchildren by name in the will, the court held that it appeared from the face of the will that the grandchildren were not unintentionally overlooked or omitted from the will, and that by the use of the word "children" the testator meant also the issue of his deceased daughters as well as his living children. In Estate of Hassell, supra, three children were not named or provided for in the will, but there was this provision:

"Those of my heirs, not herein mentioned, has been omitted by me with full knowledge thereof."

It was held that the intent of the testator, as thus expressed, was clearly sufficient to indicate that the omission was not unintentional. In this behalf the court said:

"At law, while the word [heirs] may include others, it always includes the children of a decedent."

In Estate of Lindsay, supra, a will, after giving all the testator's property to his wife, recited that the disposition was purposely made, because he knew that she would provide for "their son" and then further declared:

"Should any other person or persons present themselves claiming to be heirs of mine, I give and bequeath to such person or persons the sum of five dollars ($5.00)."

The court held in that case that, inasmuch as the testator was writing of persons claiming to be "heirs," he must have had in mind his illegitimate children of whom he had made a public acknowledgment, and the court said:

"The will, read in the light of the law of succession, shows on its face that the testator had in mind the persons, or the very class of persons, here asserting a right to succeed to a portion of his estate. He did make provision for all such persons and the appellants, accordingly, do not bring themselves within the terms of section 1307, which is operative only where the testator 'omits to provide in his will for any of his children. * * *'"

In Estate of Minear, supra, the will stated in part:

(1) "I am a single man. I have never been married. (2) Now if there should be any other or others than the ones that I have named in my will above that claim to be my lawful heirs and can and do prove that they are to each of them I will ($5.00) five dollars if there should be any such."

The court said:

"Taking the two provisions together, we think it is perfectly clear that what the testator in effect said was this: 'I never have been married, therefore I have no children. But if any persons other than those named in my will prove they are my heirs (either as children or otherwise) I give each of them $5.00.' The true construction of the will we believe to be that the testator intended to exclude from any substantial share in his estate any one not named in his will, whether a child or otherwise."

[3] The rule of construction, announced in those cases, covers and controls the situation presented in the case at bar. From an examination in its entirety of the will in question, it appears to us that the intention of the testator was to permit only his wife and those of his children living at his death to share in his estate. The intent is sufficiently indicated, we think, by the words of the will itself. The declaration in the will was to the effect that the residue of the estate should go only to his living children, and that if any one of them should predecease him, then the share given to such child was to go to the others living at the time of his death and "& not their heirs or any other relatives or friends of mine." It is palpable, it seems to us, that the testator intended only his living children to share in his estate and to exclude therefrom all other persons. Not only did the testator make the fact of his children being alive at the time of his death an express condition precedent to his bequest to his living children, but he added, also, the proviso directing to whom such estate should go in the event of the death of any of his children. He expressly excluded the issue of those living children named in the will who might predecease him, and placed the issue of said living children, in the event of the death of their parent, in the same situation, with relation to the deceased, as now stand the appellants.

[4, 5] The clause excluding from participation in the testator's estate "any other relatives," considered and construed in the light of the meaning ordinarily and in law attributed to the words employed therein, is especially significant, for, coupled with the preceding clauses of the will, it indicates the testator's intention to exclude from his bounty all persons embraced within its terms. The testator presumably knew the law, and therefore must be deemed to have used the word "relatives" in its legal sense. The word "relative" is ordinarily defined to mean "one that is connected by blood, affinity, relation" (Webster's Dictionary). And, in law, "the word 'relatives' or 'relations,' when used in a devise or bequest, should be construed, unless a contrary intention appears, as meaning those next of kin who, in cases of intestacy, would take under the statutes of distribution. * * * " 40 Cyc. 1458; Thompson v. Thornton, 197 Mass. 273, 83 N. E. 880. See, also, Estate of Sowash, 62 Cal. App. 512, 217 P. 123. Marked and measured by the meaning of the word "relatives," as employed in testamentary dispositions, the conclusion is inescapable that the testator in the instant case must have had in mind his blood relations, among whom, necessarily, were his grandchildren, the appellants herein, and consequently must have intended to exclude them from participation in his estate. The testator was emphatic in his declaration that no "other relatives" should take under his will, and as was said in Estate of Lindsay, supra, "read in the light of the law of succession [section 1386, Civ. Code], the will shows on its face that the testator had in mind the persons, or the very class of persons, here asserting a right to succeed to a portion of his estate."

The general scheme of the will and the intent of the testator, as manifested by the language of the will, compel the conclusion that the testator failed to provide for appellants, not because he was oblivious of their existence, but rather, because he did not desire them to share in his estate.

Appellants, in support of their contention, cite and rely on the case of Hargadine v. Pulte, 27 Mo. 423. The will under consideration in that case was not in all respects similar to the will in the instant case. There the testator gave his entire estate to his wife and attempted to exclude "all and every person or persons." There was not apparent on the face of the will the sedulous discrimination between the living children and the grandchildren and the clear intent that testator wished only his living children to share in his bounty as appears in the will here under consideration. The ruling of the court in the case last cited is not reasoned in extenso, and is practically rested upon the case of Bradley v. Bradley, 24 Mo. 311. In the latter case, the principal provision of the will was as follows:

"That my wife, Ann Bradley, be my sole heir to all my estate. * * *"

No mention or reference was made to the children of the deceased, nor was there anything on the face of the will indicating an intent on the part of the testator to exclude purposely his children. The Bradley Case obviously is not pertinent to the point presented here. Hargadine v. Pulte, supra, was not cited, as counsel for appellants contend, by this court with approval in the Estate of Stevens, supra. The case of Bradley v. Bradley, supra, was there cited merely as affirmatory of the proposition that parol evidence is inadmissible to show the intent of the testator to exclude his children. In re Parrott's Estate, 45 Nev. 318, 203 P. 258, also relied upon by appellants, presents a will in which the testator declared that he had "no children," which in fact was not true. There was no recital in the will there, as in the will in the case at bar, evincing an intent to exclude all "other relatives." In none of the cases decided by this court and relied upon by appellants was there any declaration in the will of the testator, as in the instant case, that no other "heirs or any other relatives * * * " should share in the testator's bounty. In Estate of Stevens, supra, the testator failed to mention or provide for his daughter, but left a legacy to her child, the testator's grandson, and it was held that the fact that he mentioned his daughter's child did not necessarily imply that the daughter was in his mind, and she was accordingly permitted to take as a pretermitted heir. In Bush v. Lindsey, supra, the will made no mention of or reference to the children of the testator. A grandson, to whom all the estate was given, was the only person named in the will. In Estate of Ross, 140 Cal. 282, 73 P. 976, the testator mistakenly assumed that his son was alive, when in fact he had died leaving issue. No reference being made to the lawful heir, the issue of the deceased son, the grandson, was permitted to take as a pretermitted heir. In Estate of Utz, supra, the will made no provision for the testator's grandchildren, nor was there any general or particular reference made to them as a class. In Estate of Van Wyck, 185 Cal. 49, 196 P. 50, provision was made for the testator's son and daughter, but no mention of a grandchild, the issue of a predeceased daughter, was made. In Estate of Matthews, 176 Cal. 576, 169 P. 233, provision was made in the will for a deceased daughter, and no reference having been made to the issue of said daughter, it was held that the latter was unintentionally excluded from the will. In re Salmon, supra, the testator gave a small legacy to the respective widows of each of his deceased sons, but made no reference to the issue of said sons, and they were permitted to take as pretermitted heirs, because the mere mentioning of the widows was held to be insufficient to manifest an intent to exclude the grandchildren. In Estate of Wardell, supra, testatrix made no provision for an illegitimate daughter. The court said:

"Her name was not mentioned in it, and it does not appear by anything in the will itself that the omission was intentional."

In short, the testamentary documents under consideration in the California cases cited by appellants and just considered and discussed failed to indicate in terms, or by necessary implication, that the testator intentionally made no provision for his heirs at law. The construction of the will and the distribution of the estate, as decreed by the trial court in the instant case, are in harmony with the requirements of the law and with the manifest intent of the testator.

The decree is affirmed.

LEVIN v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 5372.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⟸4 — Physician from another state held entitled to reciprocity license.

A physician whose examination before medical examiners in Michigan was on certificate issued by qualified college that he had passed his examination and would be recommended for graduation, and to whom diploma was issued prior to certificate admitting him to practice, held entitled to reciprocity license to practice in California, all other requirements being satisfied, on application made in accordance with Medical Practice Act, § 13.

2. Physicians and surgeons ⟸2—Medical Practice Act reasonably construed.

In determining whether reciprocity license to practice medicine and surgery should issue to physician licensed in another state, Medical Practice Act should receive a reasonable construction, and the spirit should prevail over the letter.

3. Mandamus ⟸87 — Mandamus will control abuse of discretion by board of medical examiners.

Abuse of discretion by board of medical examiners, in arbitrarily refusing to issue reciprocity license under Medical Practice Act to qualified physician, regularly licensed in a sister state, because of finely drawn technicality, will be controlled by mandamus.

Original mandamus by Nathan P. Levin against the Board of Medical Examiners of California, Dr. L. P. Adams, and others, to compel respondents, as the Board of Medical Examiners, to issue petitioner a license. Writ granted.

Frederick W. Kant, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. B. Bianchi, of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Petition for mandate to compel respondents, the board of medical examiners, to issue to petitioner a license entitling him to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California.

Petitioner alleges that he is a duly licensed and practicing physician and surgeon of the state of Michigan, where he was licensed to practice medicine on the 27th day of June, 1907, after fully complying with all of the requirements of the board of medical examiners of that state; that he practiced medicine continuously in the state of Michigan from the date of the issuance of his license up to and including the month of July, 1924, except for a period of approximately one year, at which time he was a resident physician in a hospital in the city of Denver, state of Colorado.

It further alleges that petitioner has presented satisfactory credentials concerning his practice to the board which board acknowledges are sufficient to establish the fact that petitioner is of good moral character, and that he has had no charges preferred against him nor controversies during his practice in relation to the same; that petitioner is a graduate of the Detroit College of Medicine of the class of 1907, at which time such institution was a member of the Association of the American Medical Colleges, and has always been rated class A by the American Medical Association, and that such college fully complied with the standards set by the law of the state of California in 1907, and ever since has complied with such standards.

It is then recited that in accordance with section 13 of the Medical Practice Act of the state of California (St. 1913, p. 730), the petitioner applied to the board of medical examiners of the state of California for the issuance of a certificate to practice medicine in said state, and that he paid a registration fee of $100 in accordance with the terms of said section; that he produced the certificate entitling him to practice medicine issued by the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan, and proved to the satisfaction of the board that he was the person named in said certificate, and that it was issued to him in the year stated; that the requirements of the Detroit College of Medicine from which the petitioner graduated, and the requirements of the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan, which board was legally authorized to issue such certificate permitting petitioner to practice medicine, was not in any degree or particular less than those which are required for the issuance of a similar certificate to practice medicine in the state of California at the date of the issuance of said certificate. Petitioner also furnished respondents with satisfactory evidence showing that the requirements of the Detroit College of Medicine, which issued the certificate to petitioner, were up to the standard set by the California board.

It is then charged that respondents found that the requirements of the board issuing such certificate were not, when said certificate was issued, in any degree or particular less than the requirements provided for by the law of the state of California at such date, and that petitioner had been a resident of the state from which the application is based for a period of one year subsequent to the issuance of such certificate, but, notwithstanding these facts, the board refused petitioner a license to practice in this state solely upon the ground that the certificate which he presented to the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan upon entering the examination in that state was not in fact a diploma.

Petitioner then alleges that he had taken a full course at the Detroit College of Medicine, and was on the 24th day of May, 1907, given a certificate by the secretary of that college stating in substance that petitioner had passed his final examinations at said college, and would be recommended to the trustees of such college for graduation; that petitioner presented his certificate to the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan on May 27, 1907; that on May 30th following, at a conference of the examiners of the Detroit College of Medicine petitioner received a diploma from such college conferring upon him the degree of doctor of medicine. Upon the filing of the application an alternative writ was issued by this court. Respondents appeared and demurred and answered. From the answer it appears that petitioner filed a class C application for reciprocity with the respondent board on the 8th day of June, 1925, petitioning said board for a reciprocity license to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California, under and by virtue of section 13 of the Medical Practice Act of this state; that the application was made and based upon a license and certificate to practice medicine and surgery in the state of Michigan, which license was dated, made, and issued on the 27th day of June, 1907; that the application certified that the Michigan license was procured on a written examination taken and had on the 27th, 28th, and 29th days of May, 1907, and that said petitioner was admitted to said written examination on the degree and diploma of doctor of medicine issued by the Detroit College of Medicine and Surgery on the 30th day of May, 1907.

It is admitted that the Detroit College of Medicine is a member of the Association of American Medical Colleges, and is classified by the American Medical Association as Class A, and its graduates are and have been admitted to practice in the state of California at all times upon the diploma issued by it. They deny, however, that petitioner had received such a diploma at the time he presented himself for examination before the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan, and the act of said board in subsequently admitting petitioner to practice adopted a standard less than that required by the laws of this state, which justified them in refusing to issue petitioner the reciprocity license applied for. In this connection it appears from the answer to the petition that petitioner, in support of his declaration that he had received a diploma of the Detroit College of Medicine, also presented to respondent board a document issued by the secretary of the Detroit College of Medicine informing petitioner that he had passed his final examinations by the faculty and would be recommended to the board of trustees for graduation.

It was upon this certificate that petitioner was permitted to take his examinations before the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan. It further appears, however, that at the time petitioner herein presented himself to the board last mentioned the college had not issued diplomas to its graduates, but that they were in fact issued a few days later on the 30th day of May, 1907, and prior to the time petitioner was given his certificate to practice medicine and surgery in the state of Michigan.

The sole question here presented, therefore, is whether or not petitioner in legal contemplation was possessed of a diploma from the medical college mentioned at the time he was permitted to take his examinations before the board of medical examiners of the state of Michigan.

[1, 2] If the act of such board permitting him to take the examinations before his diploma could be actually made out and issued to him constituted the maintaining of a standard not equal to this state, then petitioner is not entitled to the relief sought. If, on the other hand, the possession by him of the certificate and the subsequent issuance to him of his diploma was to all legal intents and purposes the possession by him of a diploma, then it is conceded petitioner is entitled to a license on reciprocity, and it should be issued to him. To state the question is to answer it. The certificate was to all intents and purposes the equivalent of a diploma. It certified that petitioner had passed his final examinations, and he was therefore entitled as a matter of right to a diploma. Nelson v. Lincoln Medical College, 81 Neb. 533, 116 N. W. 294, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 930. Moreover, the diploma was in fact issued to him before he was granted his license. To say that under such circumstanoes he was not possessed of a diploma entitling him to take his examinations would be to put a narrow construction upon our statute, which requires the filing of a diploma prior to the taking of examinations. The statute should receive a reasonable construction, and the spirit and reason should prevail over the letter.

We are therefore of the opinion that petitioner is entitled to the relief sought.

[3] While, ordinarily, the action of an officer clothed with a discretion is not reviewable if exercised upon matters left to his discretion, yet where the discretion is abused and made to work injustice, it may be controlled by mandamus. In this case we think the board acted arbitrarily and abused its discretion.

Let the writ issue.

PEOPLE v. SWAAR. (Cr. 1212.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 8, 1925.)

1. Embezzlement ⟸44(1)—Evidence held sufficient for conviction.

Evidence held sufficient to justify conviction of embezzlement.

2. Criminal law ⟸829(1)—Instructions covered by others properly refused.

Where subject-matter of proposed instructions was fully covered by other instructions given, they were properly refused.

3. Criminal law ⟸814(1)—Instructions on collateral matters, or on matters of slight materiality, properly refused.

Where instructions, although correct, were upon such collateral matters, or matters of such slight materiality that refusal could not work any serious prejudice, they were properly refused.

4. Criminal law ⟸768(1)—Instruction as to duty of jury to consider right of people to have laws enforced held not improper.

Instruction, advising jury that duty requires them to consider right of people to have laws properly executed, and that, unless you do your duty, laws may as well be stricken from the statute books, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

Ray Swaar was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

William M. Morse, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CURTIS, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of embezzlement and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. He first questions the sufficiency of the information upon which he was placed on trial. While the information may be subject to some of the defects claimed for it by appellant, we are of the opinion that it sets forth in reasonably clear and concise language the essential elements of the crime of embezzlement. We are unable to perceive how appellant could have been materially prejudiced by any of the alleged deficiencies in said information, even assuming that they are as glaring as appellant claims them to be.

[1] It is next claimed that the evidence was not sufficient to justify the verdict. Particular stress is laid by appellant upon the receipt given by him for the bonds which he is charged with embezzling. He insists that this receipt clearly shows that the bonds were delivered to him by the owner and complaining witness for the purpose of enabling him to raise money with which he could procure an oil lease, and that he and the complaining witness were to share equally in the profits of such investment. If the evidence in the case substantiated appellant's claim that the receipt showed the true and correct terms and conditions under which the bonds had been delivered to him, we might concede the force of appellant's arguments. The receipt was written by appellant himself, some days after the bonds had been delivered to him. The complaining witness was appellant's father-in-law, and testified that he read the receipt to the best of his ability, but that he could not read all the writing, as he was a poor scholar. He further testified that the sole purpose for which the bonds were delivered to appellant was in order that the latter could use them to show his good faith in negotiating for an oil lease, and that the bonds were to be returned to him in their original form, upon the completion of said negotiations—if the lease was consummated, or if appellant failed in his endeavor to secure a lease—in either event, the bonds were to be returned intact to him, the owner. While this testimony of the complaining witness was contradicted by that of his daughter, the wife of appellant (the appellant himself was not a witness in the case), the jury evidently accepted the version of the transaction given by the complaining witness. His testimony was sufficient to show that the bonds were simply intrusted to the defendant for a certain and definite purpose, and not given, or the title thereto transferred, to appellant as claimed by the latter. The evidence further shows that the bonds, three in number and of the par value of $2,500, were hypothecated by appellant with a bank as security for the personal obligations of appellant, and that one of said bonds, of the value of $1,000, had never been recovered at the time of the trial, which evidence would tend to prove that appellant, after the bonds had been intrusted to him, without right and fraudulently, converted them to his own use. The evidence on the whole was, in our opinion, sufficient to justify the verdict against the appellant.

[2, 3] Appellant assigns as error the ruling of the court in refusing to give certain instructions, nine in number, proposed by him. The subject-matter of some of these proposed instructions was fully covered by other instructions given by the court. Others of said refused instructions did not contain a correct statement of the law as applied to the facts in this case, while still others, although correctly stating the law, were upon such collateral matters, or upon matters of such slight materiality, that their refusal by the court could not have worked any serious prejudice to appellant's rights. A detailed consideration of each of these proposed instructions, and the reasons which justified the court in refusing to give them, is not necessary, nor would any useful purpose be served by setting forth the same in detail.

[4] Appellant also makes objection to two of the instructions given by the court at the request of the prosecution. One of these instructions was evidently taken verbatim from an instruction given and approved in the cases of People v. Wolff, 182 Cal. 728, 190 P. 22, and People v. Ramey (Cal. App.) 232 P. 724. The objection to the other, that it is not justified by the evidence, is equally untenable.

The judgment and order denying motion for a new trial is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 1, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, Sept. 28, 1925.)

1. Statutes ⊜77(1)—Act must confer particular privileges or impose peculiar disabilities on class arbitrarily selected to be declared unconstitutional as "discriminatory law."

Constitution forbids special laws only where general and uniform law can be made applicable, and, to declare law unconstitutional as discriminatory, it must appear that it is not founded on natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, but confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in exercise of common right on class arbitrarily selected from general body of those who stand in precisely same relation to subject of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law.]

2. Constitutional law ⊜230(3)—Statutes ⊜76(1), 87—Act, imposing fine only on corporation violating it, held not void as discriminating against individuals.

As corporation cannot be imprisoned, but its officers and agents may be held criminally responsible with it as coprincipals (Pen. Code, § 31), and subjected to same penalties as other individuals, St. 1919, p. 1252, section 17 of which imposes fine only on corporation engaging in business of real estate broker or salesman without license, in violation of sections 1 and 2, is as uniform and general in operation as possible, and hence not violative of Const. Cal. art. 1, § 21, article 4, § 25, subds. 2, 33, or Const. U. S. Amend. 14.

3. Constitutional law ⊜230(3)—Statutes ⊜76(1), 87—Constitutionality of act held not affected by failure to prescribe punishment for copartnerships violating it; "person."

That St. 1919, p. 1252, prescribes no punishment for copartnerships engaging in business of real estate broker without license, does not make it invalid, as against Const. Cal. art. 1, § 21, article 4, § 25, subds. 2, 33, or Const. U. S. Amend. 14; partnership, as respects criminal responsibility, not being person separate from its component members, and hence unable to commit crime, especially in view of Pen. Code, § 7, defining "person" as including corporations, but not mentioning copartnerships.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Person.]

4. Partnership ⊜175—Members may be proceeded against for criminal offenses committed as copartners.

Though copartnership may not be punished as separate entity for criminal act, such as transaction of real estate brokerage business without license, in violation of St. 1919, p. 1252, delinquent members of firm are responsible for its acts and may be proceeded against for criminal offenses committed as copartners.

5. Brokers ⊜5—Receipt, showing collection of purchase money by defendant, held admissible in prosecution for engaging in brokerage business without license.

In prosecution for engaging in business of real estate broker without license, in violation of St. 1919, p. 1252, where state proved that defendant personally carried on negotiations for sale of property, collected deposit from vendee, etc., receipt in defendant's handwriting, showing that he collected first two installments of purchase price, was admissible as showing his continuation of activities in relation to sale, as against objection that real estate broker's duty ends when he has procured buyer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

A. Schomig was convicted of engaging in the business of a real estate broker and salesman without procuring a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carl S. Wood, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. The defendant, A. Schomig, was convicted by a jury of violating an act of the Legislature relating to real estate brokers and salesmen (Stats. 1919, p. 1252), to wit, engaging in the business of a real estate broker and salesman without first procuring a license therefor, as required by said act. He was sentenced to pay a fine of $200 or suffer a jail sentence, and he has appealed from the judgment.

The constitutionality of the act is attacked upon the ground that its provisions are discriminatory (subdivisions 2 and 33, § 25, art. 4, and section 21, art. 1, Const. Cal.; Amendment 14, Const. U. S.), it being contended that while said act purports to deal with individuals, copartnerships, and corporations as a class, it prescribes a different penalty for an individual than it does for a corporation and exempts a copartnership from punishment altogether.

Section 1 of said act provides:

"It shall be unlawful for any person, copartnership or corporation to engage in the business, or act in the capacity of a real estate broker, or a real estate salesman within this state without first obtaining a license therefor."

Section 2 of said act, so far as it is material here, reads:

"A real estate broker within the meaning of this act is a person, copartnership or corporation who, for a compensation, sells, * * * real estate, * * * for others as a whole or partial vocation."

Section 17 of the act provides:

"Any person or corporation acting as real estate broker or real estate salesman within the meaning of this act without a license as herein provided shall, upon conviction thereof, if a person, be punished by a fine of not to exceed two thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail or state prison for a term not to exceed two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court; or if a corporation, be punished by a fine of not to exceed five thousand dollars."

[1, 2] The Constitution does not deprive the Legislature of power to pass all special acts; but forbids special laws in all cases where a general and uniform law can be made applicable (Argyle Dredging Co. v. Chambers, 40 Cal. App. 332, 181 P. 84), and in order to declare a law unconstitutional, as being discriminatory, it must appear that it is not founded upon a natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction, but that it confers particular privileges or imposes peculiar disabilities or burdensome conditions in the exercise of a common right, upon a class arbitrarily selected from the general body of those who stand in precisely the same relation to the subject of the law. Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 238, 27 P. 604; Bloss v. Lewis, 109 Cal. 493, 41 P. 1081. It is manifest that a corporation cannot be imprisoned; it can only be fined; but its officers and agents through whose efforts the commission of the criminal act has been accomplished may be held criminally responsible as coprincipals with the corporation (Pen. Code, § 31; State v. Ice & Fuel Co., 166 N. C. 366, 81 S. E. 737, 52 L. R. A. [N. S.] 216, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 456), and if convicted be subject to the same penalty as other individuals. It would therefore appear that so far as corporations are concerned the law has been made as uniform and general in its operation as it was possible to make it, and consequently is not violative of the Constitution in the manner complained of.

[3] In reference to copartnerships it will be noted that penalties are prescribed by the act for the punishment of individuals and corporations, but none as to copartnerships. We are of the opinion, however, that this omission does not affect the constitutionality of said act for the reason that in so far as criminal responsibility is concerned, a partnership is not recognized as a person separate from its component members in the sense that a corporation is a separate entity (People v. Maljan, 34 Cal. App. 384, 167 P. 547) and therefore cannot commit a crime. California Jurisprudence (vol. 20, p. 680) states the rule in the following language:

"In most respects a partnership is but a relation, with no legal being as distinct from the members who comprise it. It is not a person, either natural or artificial. Thus a partnership, as such, cannot be guilty of crime, but guilt attaches to the delinquent member or members"—citing People v. Maljan, supra, and other cases.

[4] True, it has been held that a partnership may be regarded as a separate entity for some purposes (Furlow P. B. Co. v. Balboa L. & W. Co., 186 Cal. 754, 200 P. 625; Modesto Bank v. Owens, 121 Cal. 223, 53 P. 552; Gleason v. White, 34 Cal. 258; John Bollman Co. v. S. Bachman & Co., 16 Cal. App. 589, 117 P. 690, 122 P. 835), but those purposes are entirely dissociated with the question of responsibility for the commission of criminal acts; and our attention has not been called to any case wherein a copartnership has been treated as a "person" and thus subjected to punishment for committing a criminal act. Moreover, the Penal Code of this state declares that the word "person" shall include corporations as well as natural persons (Pen. Code. § 7), but no mention is made of copartnerships. It does not follow, though, from the fact that the copartnership itself as a separate entity may not be punished, that criminal acts committed through the operation thereof may not be made the subject of criminal prosecutions, for it is well settled that the delinquent members of the firm are responsible for the acts of the copartnership, and may be proceeded against for criminal offenses committed as copartners. 31 Corpus Juris, p. 692; 31 Cyc. 535; 20 R. C. L. p. 919.

[5] It is further contended that the trial court erred in admitting in evidence, over appellant's objection, a certain receipt, in appellant's handwriting, showing that after the sale of the property, appellant collected the first two installments of the purchase price from the vendee. Appellant urges that the duty of a real estate broker ends when he has procured a buyer ready, able, and willing to make the purchase, and that, consequently, in thereafter collecting said installments appellant was not acting in the capacity of a real estate broker or salesman.

The main defense of appellant to the charge was that the sale was not made by or through him, but by a Mrs. Wasnick, who was a licensed real estate broker operating out of appellant's place of business; that, although he collected the commission of $190 from the vendor, he afterwards paid it to Mrs. Wasnick and retained no part of it for himself. The evidence of the prosecution proved, however, that appellant personally carried on the negotiations for the sale of the property with the vendor and the vendee; that he also personally collected a deposit of $150 from the vendee, and subsequently had a settlement with the vendor for bills incurred in making repairs to the property and for expenses incurred in making the sale, which included an item of $190 for commissions, and that he gave his personal receipt to the vendor upon payment thereof. It was therefore permissible, we think, for the prosecution to show, as one of the circumstances connecting appellant with the transaction of sale, a continuation of his activities in relation thereto.

Judgment affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 1, 1925.)

1. Corporations ⊂⊃283(3)—Stockholders' proceeding to set aside election of directors must be commenced and heard in county in which election was held.

As stockholders may institute proceeding to set aside election of directors, under Civ. Code, §§ 312, 315, only, sole method prior to enactment thereof being by quo warranto in name of people, such proceeding may be commenced and heard only in county in which election was held.

2. Corporations ⊂⊃283(3)—Stockholders' proceeding to set aside election of directors cannot be instituted in wrong county subject to right to change place of trial to proper county.

Const. art. 12, § 16, does not authorize institution of stockholders' action, under Civ. Code, §§ 312, 315, to set aside election of directors, in another county than that in which election was held, subject to court's right to change place of trial to proper county; such section of Constitution referring to personal and transitory actions against corporations, not to local actions or actions over subject-matter of which certain courts are clothed with exclusive jurisdiction by Constitution or statute.

3. Constitutional law ⊂⊃56—Act, conferring jurisdiction of action on superior court of specified county, held not unconstitutional as limiting jurisdiction conferred by Constitution on every such court.

Const. art. 6, § 5, does not confer concurrent jurisdiction on every superior court of state in any special proceeding instituted therein, but merely gives such court jurisdiction of all such proceedings not otherwise provided for, without designating which court shall have jurisdiction over any particular proceeding, and hence does not invalidate Civ. Code, §§ 312, 315, conferring jurisdiction of stockholders' action to set aside election of directors on superior court of county in which election was held.

4. Prohibition ⊂⊃4—Adequacy of remedy by appeal within sound discretion of appellate court.

Whether remedy by appeal is adequate, even where jurisdiction of cause is plainly lacking, rests in sound discretion of appellate court on original application for writ of prohibition.

5. Prohibition ⊂⊃3(5)—Appeal from order, granting injunction against continued management of corporation by directors, held not adequate remedy.

Injunction, directing defendants, in stockholders' suit to set aside election of directors of corporation, to refrain from acting as directors or officers of company, is not mandatory, but preventive or prohibitory injunction, operation of which would not be stayed by appeal, which therefore would not be adequate remedy precluding writ of prohibition against further proceedings in such action, where corporation had expended many times amount of injunction bond in drilling for oil, and its lease was subject to cancellation unless work was prosecuted continuously until oil in paying quantities was found.

6. Prohibition ⊂⊃3(5)—Writ, prohibiting action in excess of, or without, jurisdiction refused only when appeal is adequate remedy.

It is only when appeal is adequate remedy that court will refuse to prohibit tribunal from acting in excess of, or without, jurisdiction.

Petition by the Elberta Oil Company, and others for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of California in and for Kings County and K. Van Zante, Judge thereof. Demurrer to petition overruled.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for petitioners.

J. L. C. Irwin, of Hanford, H. A. Savage, of Fresno, W. T. Kendrick, Jr., of Los Angeles, and Fred Baruch, Jr., for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Petition for writ of prohibition against the superior court of the county of Kings and the Honorable K. Van Zante, judge of said court, directing them to desist and refrain from further proceedings as to the first two causes of action in a certain action pending in said court. Said action, in so far as said two causes of action are concerned was instituted under sections 312 and 315 of the Civil Code, to set aside an election of certain of the petitioners herein as directors of the Elberta Oil Company, which said company it is alleged in said complaint is a corporation organized, existing and doing business under the laws of the state of California, with its principal place of business in the city of Fresno, in the county of Fresno, in this state. The third cause of action involved the legality of an assessment levied by the board of directors of said company, but this proceeding is in no way directed against the action of said superior court as to said third cause of action. No further reference will therefore be made to said third cause of action. It appears from said complaint that, at the time said action was instituted in the said county of Kings, to wit, on March 4, 1925, another action substantially, if not identically, like it, excepting as to the parties plaintiff, was then pending in the superior court of the county of Fresno, this latter action having been instituted on February 10, 1925. The plaintiffs in said action filed in the county of Kings were alleged to be stockholders of said Elberta Oil Company, as were also the plaintiffs in the action instituted in the county of Fresno, but the plaintiffs in the one case were entirely different stockholders from those who were plaintiffs in the other. In the Kings county case, the court issued a temporary injunction against all of the petitioners herein, directing them to absolutely desist and refrain from the management and control of said corporation, and from acting as the directors or officers of said company, and from doing or attempting to do or perform any act or acts as directors, secretary, or officers of said corporation, excepting to pay certain taxes, rent, labor bills, and insurance premiums.

The respondents have appeared herein and filed a demurrer and answer to said petition. The demurrer is both general and special, and also raises the question of the court's jurisdiction. The only argument, however, presented by respondents in support of their demurrer has been made in behalf of their general demurrer. We will assume, therefore, that respondents do not seriously rely upon their special demurrer, and that they do not seriously question the jurisdiction of this court to entertain this proceeding.

It is contended in support of the general demurrer that the petition herein fails to show that the superior court of Kings county has not jurisdiction of the action set forth in the first two causes of action in the complaint thereof. In other words, respondents' position is that the superior court of Kings county has jurisdiction over said action instituted therein for the purpose of setting aside an election of a board of directors of a corporation, even though said election of said board of directors was not held in said county. Section 312 of the Civil Code, after providing that at all elections had for any purpose in corporations formed for profit there must be a majority of the subscribed capital stock represented, further provides that:

"Any vote or election had other than in accordance with the provisions of this article is voidable at the instance of absent or any stockholders or members, and may be set aside by petition to the superior court of the county where the same is held."

Section 315 of the Civil Code is as follows:

"Upon the application of any person or body corporate aggrieved by any election held by any corporate body, the superior court of the county in which such election is held must proceed forthwith to hear the allegations and proofs of the parties, or otherwise inquire into the matters of complaint, and thereupon confirm the election, order a new one, or direct such other relief in the premises as accords with right and justice.

"Upon filing the petition, and before any further proceedings are had under this section, five days' notice of the hearing must be given, under the direction of the court or the judge thereof, to the adverse party, or those to be affected thereby."

[1] Prior to the enactment of these sections of the Code, or of legislation similar thereto, the only method of setting aside an election of directors at a stockholders' meeting was by quo warranto proceedings, instituted in the name of the people of the state. Whitehead v. Sweet, 126 Cal. 67, 58 P. 376. Such a proceeding could not be maintained by a stockholder nor by any number of aggrieved stockholders. The only authority, therefore, to institute in this state a proceeding like that brought against petitioners is derived from the provisions of the two sections of the Code to which we have just referred. In one instance it is provided that the election is voidable and may be set aside "by petition to the superior court of the county where the same is held," and the language of the other section is that "the superior court of the county in which such election is held" is vested with authority to proceed and hear the complaint of the aggrieved stockholders. This hearing, however, must be preceded by a five days' notice given under the direction of the court, or the judge thereof, to the adverse party. It is apparent from the language of these sections that it was the intent of the Legislature to provide a special and summary proceeding in which the election of directors of a corporation might be inquired into, and the validity thereof determined by the court. By the express terms of these sections of the Code, it is provided that such a proceeding must be commenced and heard only in the county in which the election was held. The Supreme Court in Chollar Mining Co. v. Wilson, 66 Cal. 374, 5 P. 670, in passing upon the jurisdiction of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to hear a certain proceeding then pending in said court, used the following apt language:

"The authority to the superior court to proceed is wholly statutory. It is a special proceeding provided by statute, not according to the course of the common law; and to invest such court with jurisdiction, the requisites of the act must be complied with, and it must so appear on the face of the record. If not so complied with, the court has no jurisdiction to proceed."

In an earlier case, Reed v. Omnibus R. R. Co., 33 Cal. 212, 217, the Supreme Court announced the rule as follows:

"When the statute creating the new right and prescribing a particular remedy for violation thereof, provides that the remedy must be pursued in a particular court, the rule we are considering excludes all other jurisdictions. The forum named in the statute is an element in the method of redress."

The case of Reed v. Omnibus R. R. Co. was approved in the case of Smith v. Omnibus R. R. Co., 36 Cal. 281, and has never been overruled or even criticized, to our knowledge, by the Supreme Court. It was cited with approval in the case of Clear Lake, etc., v. Lake County, 45 Cal. 90, 92. The Supreme Court in Otis v. City and County of San Francisco, 170 Cal. 98, 100, 148 P. 933, referring to the Reed Case with others announcing the same doctrine, gives its approval thereof in the following language:

"We have no disposition to criticize any of the cases cited by appellant. The principles enunciated in each and all of them are perfectly sound. Where a right is thus created by statute and the method of securing that right pointed out, in all essentials the legislative directions must be followed."

[2] It is further argued, however, by respondents that, under section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, they were authorized to institute their action in the superior court of Kings county, subject to the right of said court to change the place of trial to the proper county. This section of the Constitution undoubtedly refers to personal or transitory actions against corporations, and has no reference to local actions or to actions where either the Constitution or the statute has clothed certain courts with exclusive jurisdiction over the subject-matter of such actions. All the cases cited by respondents in support of their last contention are actions based upon mere money demands against a corporation, and in none of these actions was there any statutory or constitutional provision for the institution of actions of such character in any particular court of the state. Two of the cases upon which respondents rely are Trezevant v. Strong Co., 102 Cal. 47, 36 P. 395, and Bond v. Karma-Ajax Consolidated Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 469, 115 P. 254, and were each instituted for the purpose of recovering a money judgment. The other case cited by respondent was Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Packwood C. Co., 50 Cal. App. 296, 301, 195 P. 284, in which the court said, referring to the nature of the action, "it is purely and simply a personal or transitory action, and, being such an action, it clearly comes within the class of actions referred to by section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution, and is, therefore, as to the matter of venue, governed by said section of the organic law."

[3] Respondents further claim that the action instituted by them in the superior court of Kings county was a special proceeding provided by the statute, and that under section 5, article 6, of the Constitution, the superior court is given general jurisdiction "of all such special cases and proceedings as are not otherwise provided for." Respondents argue that the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain an action brought under section 315 of the Civil Code is provided for in the above section of the Constitution, and that it is not within the power of the Legislature to limit this jurisdiction in any manner. By this same section of the Constitution, jurisdiction is conferred upon the superior court, "in all criminal matters amounting to a felony." Respondents will hardly contend that, under this constitutional provision, an accused charged with a felony could be prosecuted in any superior court of this state, in the face of section 777 of the Penal Code providing that:

"The jurisdiction of every public offense is in the county wherein it is committed."

It is unquestionably true that where the Constitution has conferred jurisdiction upon any court of the state, any legislative enactment is void which attempts to limit the jurisdiction thereby conferred. This principle is elementary and needs no authority to support it, but the fallacy in respondents' argument is in asserting that by the above section of the Constitution concurrent jurisdiction is conferred upon every superior court of the state in any special proceeding which may be instituted therein. All said section attempts to provide, in so far as special proceedings are concerned, is that the superior court shall have jurisdiction of all such proceedings as are not otherwise provided for. It does not purport to designate which of the superior courts of the state shall have jurisdiction over any particular proceeding. In the absence of any such provision, the Legislature may make such designation. This principle is well stated by the Supreme Court in Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 379, 26 P. 206, 207, as follows:

"Jurisdiction of special proceedings is conferred by the Constitution upon the superior court; but inasmuch as special proceedings are only such as are created and authorized by statute, the court, in the exercise of this jurisdiction, is limited by the terms and conditions under which the proceedings were authorized."

We think it appears, therefore, from the above authorities that the exclusive jurisdiction of proceedings instituted under sections 312 and 315 of the Civil Code is in the superior court of the county in which the election mentioned in said sections has been held. It follows, therefore, that the superior court of Fresno county, being the county in which said election was held, has exclusive jurisdiction of any and all proceedings instituted under said sections of the Code to set aside said election, and that the Superior court of Kings county is without any right, authority, or jurisdiction to entertain the same.

[4] Respondents further contend that, even conceding that the superior court of Kings county has no jurisdiction over said action, in so far as the first two causes of action of the complaint are concerned, still petitioners' application for a writ of prohibition should be denied, as they have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law by an appeal. Respondents rely in support of this claim, in the main, upon the case of Greenberg v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 235 P. 92. It was there held that:

"The writ of prohibition may issue only upon a showing that the petitioner has no 'plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law.' * * * The right of appeal from the order complained of has always been held a 'remedy in the ordinary course of law.'"

It was also stated in this case that:

"Cases have been cited wherein the reviewing court held that the want of jurisdiction to make the order complained of was apparent, and that, though an appeal would lie from the order, it could not be said to be a 'speedy and adequate remedy,' because of the expense and trouble incident to the particular litigation. These cases all rest on the principle that the writ of prohibition is a writ of discretion, and not a writ of right, and the discretion of the reviewing court was exercised in each case in view of the exceptional circumstances presented."

Respondents also rely upon the following cases: United Railroads v. Superior Court, 172 Cal. 80, 155 P. 463, and Agassiz v. Superior Court, 90 Cal. 101, 27 P. 49. From the authorities to which our attention has been called, we are of the opinion that the correct rule upon this subject was stated by Judge Shaw in his concurring opinion in Glide v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 29, 81 P. 228, wherein he used the following language:

"The question whether or not the remedy by appeal is adequate is, even in cases where jurisdiction is plainly lacking, a matter resting in the sound discretion of this court upon the particular circumstances of each case. Upon such a question precedents are of little value."

[5] In the Greenberg Case it was held that the remedy by appeal was adequate, and the court denied the application of petitioner therein for writ of prohibition against the respondent court to prevent the enforcement of an order to pay certain rentals to receiver made after judgment. The appellate court held that, by an appeal from said order and the filing of an undertaking on appeal, the execution of said order would have been stayed, and that this remedy in the ordinary course of law was plain, speedy, and adequate. The injunction issued against the petitioners herein, directing them to refrain from doing certain acts enumerated therein, is a preventive or prohibitory, and not a mandatory, injunction. Its operation, therefore, would not be stayed by an appeal. United Railroads Co. v. Superior Court, 172 Cal. 80, 155 P. 463, and Jacobsen v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 319, 219 P. 986, 29 A. L. R. 1399. The only protection afforded petitioners herein, the defendants in said Kings county action, in case of an appeal and reversal of the order granting a temporary injunction, is by virtue of the bond given by the plaintiffs in said action upon the granting of said injunction. The order granting the temporary injunction recites that the amount of this bond is $1,000. We have already alluded to the fact that by the injunction the petitioners are restrained from the management and control of the business of the Elberta Oil Company. This injunction runs against, not only those petitioners who are the de facto directors of said company and whose election it is sought by said action to set aside, but against the corporation itself. From the petition it appears that the Elberta Oil Company, at the time of the institution of said action against it and the other petitioners herein, was engaged in drilling for oil on certain lands situated in the county of San Luis Obispo; that it had expended in the neighborhood of $85,000 in such work; that it had drilled a well on said lands to a depth of 2,680 feet, and that the indications were that within a short time oil would be produced in paying quantities from said well; that it is extremely hazardous to allow said well to stand without attention, and that said well was being drilled upon lands held by said company under a lease, one of the conditions of which is that said lease will be subject to cancellation, unless the work of drilling for oil on said land is prosecuted diligently and continuously until oil is found in paying quantities.

The temporary injunction restrains all the petitioners, including the Elberta Oil Company, from the management and control of said corporation, and from doing any act with the exception of those already mentioned. Under such a state of affairs, will an appeal be an adequate remedy and protection to respondents? We think not. In the first place, an appeal would not stay an execution of the order of injunction. Therefore, pending the appeal, all work of drilling the well and of any other character must cease, and the property of the corporation, upon which many thousands of dollars have been expended in its development, left to deteriorate, if not to become an absolute loss. Furthermore, should the lease of the land, upon which the well now being drilled is situated, be forfeited for failure to comply with the provisions of the lease requiring a continuous prosecution of the work thereon, a contingency not unlikely to happen, then not only would the company and its stockholders lose the large sums of money already invested therein, but they would sustain the further loss also of any prospective profits which might accrue from the discovery of oil upon said land. The amount of such damages would not only be exceedingly difficult, but practically impossible, to fix in any action which might be brought by petitioners against respondents, in the event they should be successful on said appeal. It is quite evident that a bond of $1,000, under such circumstances, would be woefully inadequate. Respondents' reply to this situation is that the petitioners are authorized, in the event the bond is deemed insufficient, to apply to the superior court, in which the action is pending, for an order to increase the amount of said bond to a sum which would cover all probable damages that petitioners might sustain by reason of the granting of said injunction. It is true that a bond given under such circumstances has been held to be legal and binding upon the parties executing the same. Lambert v. Haskell, 80 Cal. 611, 22 P. 327.

[6] There is, however, no assurance that in case such an application were to be made by petitioners, the relief prayed for would be granted. The cases are numerous in this state wherein the writ of prohibition has been granted, although the petitioners therein were entitled to an appeal, on the ground that an appeal was not an adequate remedy. Ophir Silver Mining Co. v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 467, 82 P. 70; Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390; Consolidated Adjustment Co. v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 92, 207 P. 552. It is only when an appeal is an adequate remedy that the court will refuse to prohibit a tribunal in acting in excess of or without jurisdiction. As was said by the Supreme Court, in Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 397, 24 P. 121, 139 (10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192):

"The statute does not say that the writ will not issue in any case where there is an appeal. There must not only be a right of appeal, but the appeal must furnish an adequate remedy, in order to prevent the issuance of the writ. A number of cases have been decided in this court in which writs of prohibition have been refused, because there was a right of appeal, but in all of those cases the appeal afforded a complete and adequate remedy for the threatened excess of jurisdiction."

We conclude, therefore, that the petition alleges facts sufficient to entitle petitioners, provided said facts are true, to the writ as prayed for. The demurrer, therefore, of respondents is hereby overruled.

The answer filed herein raises a number of issues of fact, which must be determined before this matter can be finally disposed of. Therefore the parties hereto are given 20 days within which to file a stipulation of the facts herein. If, however, they are unable to agree as to said facts, within said time, then an order will be made by this court appointing a referee to take the testimony of the parties hereto and report the same to this court.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

74 Cal. App. 125

PEOPLE v. RYAN. (Cr. 1213.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 3, 1925.)

1. Forgery ⊂⊃8 — Drawing check payable to cash under fictitious name, if in good faith, not a forgery under Penal Code.

Drawing of check payable to cash under assumed name, if done in good faith, and not for purposes of defrauding, is not the use of a fictitious name within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 470, providing that one, who with intent to defraud signs the name of a fictitious person, shall be guilty of forgery.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Fictitious Name.]

2. Forgery ⊂⊃8—Use of fictitious name on check drawn to order of cash forgery under Penal Code, where intended to defraud.

Where accused deposited forged check under fictitious name payable to order of such fictitious person, and drew against that account by check payable to cash in the fictitious name, contention that a check payable to order of maker is not subject of forgery, until indorsed, does not apply to crime of forgery of fictitious name under Pen. Code, § 470, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 673), where fictitious name was adopted for use in a fraudulent transaction.

3. Criminal law ⊂984—Several counts, charging drawing and forging of different checks, do not constitute one crime, though deposited at one time.

In a conviction for forgery on several counts involving different checks, where some of counts charged drawing of checks and others only forging, depositing of checks in bank at one time did not constitute one crime.

4. Criminal law ⊂984 — Forging different checks constitutes different offenses, but utterance of different forged checks at same time constitutes one offense.

In a conviction for forgery on several counts, the making and forging of different checks constituted different offenses, but the passing and utterance of several forged checks, at same time, constituted but one offense.

5. Criminal law ⊂1184—Judgment of conviction reduced, where several sentences on different counts are of equal duration by making one sentence for one crime.

Where several sentences for forgery were erroneously imposed on different counts, and there is no doubt of defendant's guilt, and punishment on all counts was of equal duration, a new trial will not be granted, but judgment of conviction will be reduced under Pen. Code, § 1260, giving court power to modify judgment by striking sentences so as to make one sentence for one crime.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edwin F. Hahn, Judge.

William Francis Ryan was convicted of forgery on 26 counts, and he appeals. Sentence on 5 counts stricken, otherwise affirmed.

Wallace W. Davis and Halverson & Price, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted on 26 counts of an indictment, of which 9 counts charged the commission of forgery, and 17 charged the commission of the crime of forgery of a fictitious name. There was no demurrer to the complaint, and the points on appeal relate to the case as made by the evidence.

Appellant's first point is that the checks described in counts 5, 11, 16, 23, 27, and 32 were not forgeries or forgeries of a fictitious name within the meaning of the statute. Count 5 may be taken as representing this group. The defendant was accused therein of the crime of "forgery of a fictitious name, a felony." The document containing the alleged forgery reads as follows:

"Los Angeles Branch 16–66 Bank of Italy Savings Commercial Trust.
"Los Angeles, Cal., 3/22, 1923.
"Pay to the order of cash $2781.00, twenty-seven eighty-one no/ dollars.
"M. P. Layton."

It was alleged, among other things, that the said check "was then and there false and fictitious to the then knowledge of the said William Francis Ryan, and there was not then and there or at all any such person or individual as M. P. Layton, and the said William Francis Ryan then and there well knowing that he had no authority so to sign the name of said fictitious person to and upon said check."

[1] Appellant claims that because the check was payable to the order of cash and was his own personal check, as the bank well knew, although signed in the assumed name, such assumed name represented a real person and cannot be held to be fictitious. The argument is grounded upon the proposition, to which we agree, that a person may adopt a name different from that by which he has been known, and may transact business in that name. If this be done in good faith, and not for the purpose of defrauding in the transaction, the use of such assumed name, even in the drawing of a check, would not be criminal. The use of such a name in that manner would not be the use of a fictitious name, within the meaning of the statute. The persons guilty of forgery as described in section 470 of the Penal Code include one who, "with intent to defraud, signs the name of another person, or of a fictitious person, knowing that he has no authority so to do, to * * * any * * * check. * * *" Section 476 of the Penal Code imposes punishment in the state prison upon one who "makes, passes, utters, or publishes, with intention to defraud any other person, * * * any fictitious bill, note, or check, purporting to be the bill, note, or check, or other instrument in writing for the payment of money or property of some bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual, when, in fact, there is no such bank, corporation, copartnership, or individual in existence, knowing the bill, note, check, or instrument in writing to be fictitious."

[2] The method of procedure of the defendant is illustrated by the transactions relating to the fifth count. Having been first introduced to the Bank of Italy under the assumed name of M. P. Layton, he deposited two forged checks payable to the order of M. P. Layton, the total of these two checks amounting to $16,610. Thereafter he drew against that account by his check as M. P. Layton payable "to the order of cash," in the sum of $2,781. Admittedly the evidence was sufficient to establish the fact that there was no M. P. Layton. In substance, the contention amounts to nothing more than that, although, according to the evidence, defendant was guilty of obtaining money under false pretenses, yet that he was not technically guilty of the crime of forgery or forgery of a fictitious name.

Special reliance is placed by appellant upon decisions which hold that "it is the essence of forgery that one signs the name of another to pass it off as the [genuine] signature * * * of that other" (People v. Bendit, 111 Cal. 274, 278, 43 P. 901, 902 [31 L. R. A. 831, 52 Am. St. Rep. 186]); and that a check payable to the order of the maker can defraud no one, and is not the subject of forgery until it is indorsed by the maker. People v. Thornburgh, 4 Cal. App. 38, 87 P. 234. We think that these decisions are not applicable to the crime of forgery of a fictitious name as defined by section 470 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 673), in a case where, as here, it appears that the assumed and fictitious name was adopted by the criminal for the specific purpose of using it in the consummation of the fraudulent transaction. In an elaborate note on this subject found in 9 A. L. R. 407 et seq., at page 411, it is said:

"But while one may sign a fictitious name which he has adopted for innocent purposes without being guilty of forgery, and while an assumption of a name generally for purposes of fraud is not sufficient to convict of forgery unless in the particular case fraud is shown in using the name, yet, if such fraud is shown, the fact that the name had been previously assumed by the one signing it, and used for purposes of fraud generally, with no reference to the particular fraud, will not prevent the signature being a forgery; one cannot acquire a right to use a name not his own for fraudulent purposes, by using it any number of times previously for such purposes. Commonwealth v. Costello (1876) 120 Mass. 358."

[3] The second point urged by appellant is that he has been erroneously convicted on several counts and separately sentenced thereon, when in fact there was in relation to those counts not more than one criminal offense committed. This argument covers several groups of transactions. They may be illustrated by counts 6, 8, and 10, under which it was shown that on or about the 19th day of June, 1923, under the assumed name of O. V. Snell, the defendant deposited with the First National Bank of Los Angeles three forged checks, payable to the order of O. V. Snell, one for $3,960, one for $14,880, and one for $16,570. Of these three checks, the first purported to be signed by C. M. Olsen, the second by A. H. Gregg, and the third by J. M. Auckland. The evidence shows that, in opening an account with the bank, the defendant presented all of these checks at the same time. Appellant argues that on these facts the depositing of this group of checks constituted a single utterance, and that thereby, if he was guilty of any crime, he committed one crime and not three.

Count 6 charges that the defendant, with intent to cheat and defraud, etc., did willfully, etc., make, utter, publish, and pass one of said checks. Count 8 charges that the defendant with like intent, did willfully, etc., make, forge, alter, and counterfeit another of said checks. Count 10 charges that the defendant, with like intent, did willfully, etc., make, forge, alter, and counterfeit the third of said checks. It will be noted that the uttering and passing of the check is charged in the sixth count only. In People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, it appeared that the indictment included in one count both the charge that the defendant feloniously made, forged, and counterfeited a described draft, and that, the same having on its face been first accepted and indorsed, as stated in the indictment, and having said forged indorsement thereon, he did feloniously utter, publish, and pass said instrument and said forged indorsement. The Supreme Court held that the indictment was good whether it be regarded as containing two counts or one; that each of the stated acts singly or altogether, if committed with reference to the same instrument, constituted but one offense. But the state claimed that the case was different from those usually presented in which the several charges relate to the same instrument, because the draft in question appeared to have been accepted and indorsed between the time of alleged forgery and the time of alleged uttering of the instrument, and that it thereby became a different instrument, so that there were two offenses instead of one. The court held, however, that the mere adding of other parties did not destroy the identity of the instrument nor the unity of the transactions, and that the act of forging and the act of uttering were therefore both committed with reference to the same instrument; that so long as the various acts mentioned in the statute were committed with reference to the same instrument, they must be regarded as constituting one continuous transaction. People v. Frank, supra, is the only California decision cited by appellant. In view of the fact that in the case of the three counts now under consideration there were three separate instruments involved, it becomes clear that the Frank Case is not applicable here.

[4] Appellant further refers to decisions which hold that the passing or utterance of several forged instruments at the same time constitutes but one offense. We are satisfied that the greater weight of authority is definitely in favor of this proposition. State v. Egglesht, 41 Iowa, 574, 20 Am. Rep. 612; State v. Moore, 86 Minn. 422, 90 N. W. 787, 61 L. R. A. 819, and note. But, on the other hand, it seems to have been held, with good reason, that the mere false making and forging of two separate instruments, although done at the same time, are separate and distinct offenses. This was the implication in the opinion of the Supreme Court of California in People v. Frank, supra, to which we have referred. In State v. Moore, supra, the court said:

"It is true that the forging of a note, and a mortgage purporting to secure its payment, are separate offenses," —although the court also held that the indivisible single act of uttering two such instruments constitutes a single crime and not two crimes. In the note, at 61 L. R. A. page 822, the proposition is stated, followed by reference to a number of decisions, that the forgery of several instruments at the same time is regarded generally as the commission of a separate offense for each instrument. Evidently this statement referred to the direct act of forgery considered apart from the utterance of the instrument.

Accepting the foregoing as a correct statement of the law, and remembering that utterance, or passing, of a check was charged in only one of the three counts, we conclude that appellant was correctly convicted and sentenced separately for the three offenses covered by counts 6, 8, and 10. The same is true of the group included in counts 20, 21, and 22, wherein count 20 alone charges utterance of the forged paper. The case is different with respect to the other four groups. In the group composed of counts 12, 13, and 15, utterance of a check is charged in counts 12 and 13, but not in count 15. In the group composed of counts 17, 18 and 19, utterance is charged in counts 17 and 18, but not in count 19. In the group composed of counts 24, 25, and 26, utterance is charged in counts 24 and 25 and omitted from count 26. In the group composed of counts 28, 29, 30, and 31 utterance is charged in counts 28, 29, and 30, and omitted from count 31.

It thus appears that, under counts 12 and 13, appellant has been made to suffer two sentences to be served consecutively for a single crime. Under counts 17 and 18 there are two like sentences for a single crime. Under counts 24 and 25 there are two like sentences for a single crime, and under counts 28, 29, and 30 there are three like sentences for a single crime.

[5] There being no doubt of the defendant's guilt in point of fact, a reversal of these particular judgments should not open the case for a new trial, unless some rule of procedure compels that result. The crimes involved in this action do not include any instance of inequality in the duration of the punishment provided by law. There can be no miscarriage of justice if the sentences are reduced in number in such manner that there remains only one sentence for one crime. The Penal Code, § 1260, provides that the court may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment "and may, if proper, order a new trial." In view of the equality in penalties as between the different offenses, the defendant cannot be substantially interested in the selection of the judgment which shall stand if the remaining sentence or sentences for the same offense are set aside. The superior court might have made that selection, and the defendant would not have been prejudiced thereby. Lovejoy v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 89, 48 S. W. 521. See note of that and other cases in 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 561 et seq.

The court below pronounced a separate sentence on each count, under which the defendant was convicted, and provided that the sentences run consecutively. Appellant has treated these separate sentences as constituting, which they do, in substance, a single judgment, and has appealed "from the final judgment of conviction" in the action. It is ordered that the judgment be, and the same hereby is, modified as follows: By striking from said judgment the sentence imposed and based upon conviction under counts 13, 18, 25, 29, and 30 of the indictment. In all other respects and with reference to all other portions of said sentences and judgment, the same are hereby affirmed.

McMULLIN v. LYON FIREPROOF STORAGE CO. (Civ. 3990.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. July 29, 1925.)

1. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)—Determination of trial court that delivery by warehouseman was without written order final, where record shows conflicting evidence.

In action for conversion by warehouseman, where warehouseman contended delivery was made on plaintiff's written order, held, that, in view of conflicting evidence as shown by record, findings of trial court are final.

2. Warehousemen ⇐25(5)—Warehouseman liable for delivering community property to wife without husband's consent, where goods deposited in husband's name.

Where husband deposited community goods with warehouseman in his own name, warehouseman could not deliver goods to the wife without the written consent of the husband, and such delivery was not justifiable, under Warehouse Act, §§ 9(a), 10, and hence warehouseman is liable for conversion in making such delivery as though he had delivered to utter stranger.

3. Husband and wife ⇐267(1)—Storage by husband of community property not a disposal of same without consideration within statute.

Where husband stored community property in warehouse as though it was his separate estate, such storage was not a disposal of them without consideration, within purview of Civ. Code, § 172.

4. Warehousemen ⇐24(7) — Warehouseman not liable for greater than agreed value of articles in receipt, though guilty of negligence in delivering to wrong party.

Where application for storage in warehouse receipt provided that responsibility of warehouseman was limited to $25 per article, which was below their actual value, held, in view of Civ. Code, § 2175, and despite Warehouse Act, § 57, that such agreement was not violative of section 3 of Warehouse Act providing that a warehouseman may not limit liability for failure to exercise ordinary care, and warehouseman is not therefore liable for actual value of articles or a greater amount than agreed on, even though guilty of negligence in delivering them to wrong party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Fred McMullin against the Lyon Fireproof Storage Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Charles A. Post and H. S. Clewett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lucius L. Solomons, of San Francisco, and Fred C. Peterson, of Oakland, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action in conversion. Plaintiff, a married man, deposited certain personal effects, the community property of himself and his wife, with defendant, a warehouse keeper, and they were stored by defendant in plaintiff's name. Defendant thereafter delivered the articles to the wife and the present action was the result of the delivery; suit having been instituted after due demand by plaintiff for a return of the goods. Plaintiff had judgment and defendant appeals.

[1] One of the questions of fact at the trial was whether the delivery of the property to the wife was made upon the written order of respondent, presented to appellant by the wife. The trial court found that the wife presented no such order to appellant and that respondent issued no such order. It is contended that the finding was not supported by the evidence. The wife testified that the alleged order was given her by respondent; that she exhibited it to appellant before the personal property was delivered to her, but did not leave it with appellant; and that she thereafter destroyed it. Other witnesses testified that they had seen the alleged order. On the other hand, respondent testified that he never issued or made such a document. Under these circumstances the finding must stand. The record shows but a conflict of evidence and the determination of the trial court upon the subject is therefore final.

The court also found that appellant delivered the articles to the wife "without authority and contrary to the terms and conditions of its storage receipt" which was issued to respondent when he made deposit of the goods. It is insisted that this finding was not sustained by the evidence and in support of the contention the argument is advanced that, the deposited articles having been community property, a delivery to the wife was a delivery to the husband, or, at least, that the wife, because of her community interest, was as much entitled to the possession of the property as was the husband, although the delivery for storage with the depositary was made by him and not by her. This point is also made against a finding of the trial court that appellant converted the goods to its own use by making delivery of them to the wife.

The business of appellant as a warehouse keeper is regulated by the provisions of an act of the Legislature passed in 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 437; Deering Gen. Laws 1923, Act 9059). Section 8 of the act provides, in part, the portions omitted not being pertinent to the present inquiry:

"A warehouseman, in the absence of some lawful excuse provided by this act, is bound to deliver the goods upon a demand made either by the holder of a receipt for the goods or by the depositor. * * * In case the warehouseman refuses or fails to deliver the goods in compliance with a demand by the holder or depositor, * * * the burden shall be upon the warehouseman to establish the existence of a lawful excuse for such refusal."

Section 9 reads:

"A warehouseman is justified in delivering the goods, subject to the provisions of the three following sections, to one who is— (a) the person lawfully entitled to the possession of the goods, or his agent, (b) a person who is either himself entitled to delivery by the terms of a nonnegotiable receipt issued for the goods, or who has written authority from the person so entitled either indorsed upon the receipt or written upon another paper, or (c) a person in possession of a negotiable receipt by the terms of which the goods are deliverable to him or order or to bearer, or which has been indorsed to him or in blank by the person to whom delivery was promised by the terms of the receipt or by his mediate or immediate indorsee."

Section 10 of the act follows:

"Where a warehouseman delivers the goods to one who is not in fact lawfully entitled to the possession of them, the warehouseman shall be liable as for conversion to all having a right of property or possession in the goods if he delivered the goods otherwise than as authorized by subdivisions (b) and (c) of the preceding section and though he delivered the goods as authorized by said subdivision[s] he shall be so liable, if prior to such delivery he had either (a) been requested, by or on behalf of the person lawfully entitled to a right of property or possession in the goods, not to make such delivery, or (b) had information that the delivery about to be made was to one not lawfully entitled to the possession of the goods."

Sections 11 and 12 are also referred to in section 9, but nothing in either of them is material to the present controversy.

At the time of the deposit of the personal property with appellant by respondent, the former issued to the latter its nonnegotiable warehouse receipt, in accordance with provisions of the Warehouse Act to which we have not found it necessary to refer. The receipt contained the following language:

"Received for the account of Fred McMullen, the goods enumerated in the schedule annexed. * * * Goods will be delivered upon receipt of a written order signed by the person in whose name they are stored. * * *"

Appellant also issued to respondent, at the time the goods were deposited, a document, a part of which, under the heading, "Important," read:

"Many of our customers are not familiar with warehouse rules that are required by the laws of this state, and which are for the protection of the customer who stores his goods, as well as for the warehouseman. Goods can only be delivered on the order of the party in whose name they are stored. This rule applies to husband, or wife, as well as others. * * * Should you desire to allow any other than yourself to have access to, or to remove, any or all of your goods, please fill in, sign, and mail us the attached blank order and have the party so authorized sign his or her name for identification."

The blank order mentioned was part of the document.

[2, 3] Under the provisions of the Warehouse Act, and upon the language of the documents issued by appellant to respondent pursuant to its terms, we cannot perceive how appellant can justify a delivery of the stored goods to the wife of respondent. It is at once obvious that the delivery was not proper under the provisions of either subdivision (b) or subdivision (c) of section 9 of the act, as the wife was not within the terms of either. How can she have been within the language of subdivision (a)? Was she "lawfully entitled to the possession of the goods" merely because they were community property? Under the provisions of subdivision (a) the warehouse keeper doubtless could have delivered the property to any one who was entitled to their exclusive possession as against respondent, with impunity. That seems apparent from the very language of the law. But such a right on the part of appellant is very different from a right to deliver possession to an individual who enjoyed an equal right of possession with respondent—assuming that the wife had that right. Here we might possibly rest the matter, for the wife could claim no more than that she was in law entitled to the possession of the goods equally with her husband. The point now suggested, however, need not be decided, for she could not justify even a claim as great as that referred to. "The husband has the management and control of the community personal property, with like absolute power of disposition, other than testamentary, as he has of his separate estate; provided, however, that he cannot make a gift of such community personal property, or dispose of the same without a valuable consideration, or sell, convey, or incumber the furniture, furnishings, or fittings of the home, or the clothing or wearing apparel of the wife or minor children that is community, without the written consent of the wife." Civ. Code, § 172. It would not seem that the act of respondent in depositing for storage the property here in question came within that part of this section following the word "provided." By that act he did not make a gift of the property or dispose of it without consideration. Surely, the question of consideration, within the meaning of the statute, was not involved in his storing the goods with appellant for safe-keeping, and we therefore need not pause to determine whether his deposit for storage amounted to a disposal of them. The property consisted of furniture and fittings for the home, it is true, but in storing it respondent plainly did not "sell, convey or incumber it" as the provision forbidding such acts without the written consent of the wife is intended by the statute. The inhibition of section 172 thus being put out of consideration, respondent dealt with the goods in storing them as if they were his separate estate, as allowed under the first part of the enactment. Not only does this seem plain upon the face of the section, but the Supreme Court has lately so declared, in effect. Roberts v. Wehmeyer, 191 Cal. 601, 218 P. 22. Not only so, but, if a cause of action for the recovery of the goods had arisen in favor of the community while appellant yet held them, the wife could not have maintained suit to enforce the claim, if respondent were still alive and were still her husband, and if the cause of action arose from no act of his. Chance v. Kobsted (Cal. App.) 226 P. 632. Under all these circumstances it seems futile to assert that appellant could deliver the goods to the wife, in the manner shown by the evidence presented here, and thus provide itself with a defense against this action brought by respondent. It would seem manifest that appellant is, in the present action, in no better situation than it would have been if the goods had been delivered under the same circumstances to an utter stranger to the community relationship existing between respondent and his wife. In support of the defense made by it, appellant cites Schuler v. Savings & Loan Soc., 64 Cal. 397, 1 P. 479; Tibbetts v. Fore, 70 Cal. 242, 11 P. 648; People v. Swalm, 80 Cal. 46; Steele v. Marsicano, 102 Cal. 666, 36 P. 920; and Fennell v. Drinkhouse, 131 Cal. 447, 63 P. 734, 82 Am. St. Rep. 361, but we think none of these cases bears upon the question presented.

[4] The findings of the trial court show that respondent made written application to appellant for the storage of the goods which were placed in appellant's care; that the warehouse receipt issued when the goods were received by appellant recited that the responsibility of appellant under the storage arrangement should be limited to the sum of $25 for each piece or parcel stored, or its contents, unless the value thereof was made known at the time of storage, when a higher rate for the service would be charged than was really exacted; that the value of certain packages which were stored was not made known to appellant at the time and that appellant never had notice of the value thereof; and that appellant charged respondent a lesser rate of storage than it would have charged if a higher value than $25 per package had been declared by respondent at the time the goods were stored. Not only did the warehouse receipt contain the recital above stated, limiting the liability of appellant, but the written application for storage made by respondent contained language practically identical in form, and, in effect, asked for a low rate of storage because of the low valuation placed on the packages. The trial court found, however, in its conclusions of law, that respondent was entitled to judgment for the full value of the articles included in the packages in question and rendered judgment accordingly. It is now contended that the judgment was in this respect excessive; that is, it is insisted that the judgment, in so far as it was based upon the value of the packages mentioned, should have been limited to the sum of $25 for each package, whereas, the trial court found the actual value of each to be more than that sum and accordingly gave judgment for more. Respondent contends that appellant had no right to limit its liability in the respect mentioned, and that, therefore, the judgment was correct.

We first state the line of argument advanced by respondent, in effect, upon the interesting question thus presented. Section 2 of the Warehouse Act specifies what must be the contents of a warehouse receipt. Section 3 provides, in part:

"A warehouseman may insert in a receipt, issued by him, any other terms and conditions, provided that such terms and conditions shall not * * * in any wise impair his obligation to exercise that degree of care in the safe-keeping of the goods intrusted to him which a reasonably careful man would exercise in regard to similar goods of his own."

This language imports that a warehouseman may not by his warehouse receipt attempt to limit his liability for a failure to exercise at least ordinary care. Therefore, did the delivery of the goods in question here to the wife of respondent show a failure upon the part of the warehouseman to exercise that degree of care in their safe-keeping? In other words, did the breach of the bailee's agreement to deliver only to respondent, or upon his order, amount to negligence? There seems, argues respondent, in effect, to be but one answer to these questions. The exact point was before the court in Rex v. James, 62 Tex. Civ. App. 238, 131 S. W. 248, and it was there held that a delivery of goods to a person not entitled to them under the warehouse receipt issued in that case was negligence entitling the holder of the receipt to recover. In truth, the principle here involved was before this court in a comparatively recent case; the only difference being that the bailee there was not a warehouseman. An automobile had been placed in a public garage under an agreement of the keeper of the place to exercise ordinary care and prudence in the keeping and preservation of it. The evidence was that the car was delivered by the bailee to a person other than the bailor, but it was contended that this proof did not show a want of the exercise of ordinary care. In disposing of the contention this court remarked:

"It surely cannot be said that ordinary care is exercised in the keeping of an automobile under such a contract as was made here if that contract is breached by a delivery of the car to a stranger. We have no doubt that the trial court, after finding that the contract required only the exercise of ordinary care by respondent, intended the finding that the contract had been breached as a finding that such care had not been exercised. At any rate, to our minds, the finding so operates. It would be difficult to imagine a stronger case of lack of exercise of such care." Mehesy v. Mission Garage, 60 Cal. App. 275, 212 P. 643.

The act of appellant, which is the basis of the present action, having been an act of negligence, it remains to inquire, says respondent, how its attempt to limit its liability to $25 per package of the goods stored operated as an attempt to protect itself from acts of that character. On this head a part of the language used in a decided case is apposite, says respondent, although the court rendering the opinion declared that the language referred to was not necessary to the decision. The action was against a warehouseman and was brought to recover the value of a hand bag which had been stored with him, but upon which he had placed a value of $10 in the warehouse receipt or coupon issued by him. The court said:

"I think that the clause of the coupon which attempted to limit the liability of the defendant impaired its obligation to exercise that degree of care in the safe-keeping of the goods intrusted to it which a reasonably careful man would exercise in regard to similar goods of his own, and hence was a condition which the defendant had not the legal right to insert in the coupon and was void. It is a matter of common knowledge that the value of a hand bag and its contents carried by a person traveling is often many times $10, and manifestly a condition in a receipt which limits the liability of the bailee to so small a sum weakens his sense of obligation to exercise that degree of care which he would be likely to exercise if he knew that he would be held liable for the full value of the parcel stored in the event of its loss." Healy v. New York Cent. R. Co., 153 App. Div. 516, 138 N. Y. S. 287.

The decision was affirmed by the Court of Appeals of New York without opinion. Upon these premises it is argued that the judgment of the trial court, in the respect which is now under examination, was correct. The argument of appellant upon the question is now, in effect, to be stated. Section 2175 of the Civil Code reads:

"A common carrier cannot be exonerated, by any agreement made in anticipation thereof, from liability for the gross negligence, fraud, or willful wrong of himself or his servants."

It will be observed that this enactment is like the inhibitive portion of section 3 of the Warehouse Act. Decisions based upon section 2175 of the Code are therefore of interest in measuring the effect of the similar provision of the Warehouse Act. The Supreme Court has several times been called upon to solve questions under the former which are akin to the one here presented under the latter. In one of the cases a common carrier had contracted to transport certain horses over its lines by means of a car which was chartered for the purpose by the owner of the horses at a certain rate. The shipper presented to the carrier his written "request" for the service to be rendered and in it he stated the value of each of the horses to be $20. Each was, in fact, worth much more than that sum. The "request" stated that the shipper desired the execution of a particular form of contract for the service to be rendered, which specified a lower shipping rate than that which would have been charged but for the low valuation placed on the horses. The contract between the parties was upon the form requested. The instrument recited that in case of the loss or injury of the animals through the gross negligence of the carrier the amount to be by their owner "claimed * * * shall be adjusted on the basis of value at the time and place of shipment not exceeding the declared value" set forth in the "request," "and on which declared value the rate or rates of transportation hereinbefore named by first party [the carrier] are based." There were other clauses of the contract which strengthened, amplified, and made more certain and positive the substance of the matter just quoted. Two of the horses were lost in transit through the gross negligence of the carrier, and the shipper brought suit for damages. The jury after a refusal of the trial judge to instruct that the damages found, if any, must be limited to the sum of $20 for each animal, rendered verdict for a larger sum. In reversing the judgment, the Supreme Court said:

"Now, to examine the contract under the terms of section 2175 of the Civil Code, to see if it comes within its prohibition. That section prohibits the carrier from entering into any contract in anticipation of gross negligence exonerating itself from liability therefor. Undoubtedly, a contract which attempted to relieve the carrier from liability for gross negligence, or attempted to fix a liability for only half the actual value of the property carried, or any other proportion less than such actual value, would be obnoxious to the prohibition of the section and void. But the contract in question here does not attempt to relieve the carrier from liability for the actual value of the property shipped, nor does it provide for any partial exemption from liability, nor does it provide for exemption from responsibility at all. On the contrary, the carrier assumes full responsibility for loss or injury to the property occasioned through its gross negligence to the full extent of the actual value of the property as declared by the shipper, and which valuation, by the contract between them, was agreed to be its actual valuation for all purposes. As to these purposes, it is not correct to assume that the special contract was made solely in anticipation of liability, or that liability was the principal subject-matter of the contract. It was not entered into with a view of providing solely for exemption, nor was that by any means its contemplated purpose. While it is true that the actual value of property may, in fact, be in excess of an agreed valuation in a contract, and as to that excess it may be said that the carrier is exonerated from liability, this does not render the contract otherwise fairly entered into fixing the agreed valuation, invalid. If to that extent exemption may be said to result in some instances under an agreed valuation, it only follows indirectly, because it is not the main or chief object of the contract to attain it. The primary purpose of this contract was, as the rates of transportation charged by the carrier were measured by the valuation of the property shipped, to fix an agreed valuation of the horses in question as a basis upon which freight rates should be charged and paid, on condition that in case of loss the responsibility of appellant should be measured by such agreed valuation. The contract is one in which the valuation of the property was agreed to for the purpose of fixing transportation charges and as measuring the responsibility of appellant. It was not a contract limiting liability. It was a contract dealing primarily with value—the value of the horses shipped. That was agreed to, and, of course, the agreed valuation must be deemed to be the actual valuation of the property—its actual valuation for all purposes of the contract; and as appellant assumed responsibility for loss to the full extent of such valuation there is no room for claiming that the contract was an attempt to exonerate it from the liability which the statute imposed. On the contrary, it assumed under it full liability for the actual value as that actual value was agreed on. Under this view of the contract, we cannot see how it violates the section of the Code relied on. That section, while it prohibits contracts relieving the carrier from liability for the value of property intrusted to it for carriage and loss through its gross negligence, was not intended to limit the right of contract between shipper and carrier as to what that value may be. It prohibited only the making of a contract limiting liability. The limitation of liability necessarily imports a responsibility less than full responsibility. Full responsibility under the statute for the loss of the property carried could not exceed its actual value, and while under the statute a carrier cannot by contract exonerate itself from liability for such value, there is nothing in the statute which prohibits the parties by contract from determining freely in advance what the actual value of such property is as the measure of the responsibility of the carrier when it attaches." Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pac. Co., 151 Cal. 763, 91 P. 603, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 811, 12 Ann. Cas. 1118.

Appellant also cites, as based upon the same doctrine, Michalitschke v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 118 Cal. 683, 50 P. 847; Merrill v. Pacific Transfer Co., 131 Cal. 582, 63 P. 915; and Mering v. Southern Pacific Co., 161 Cal. 297, 119 P. 80.

Leaving now the argument of appellant, we do not pause to consider whether all of the three cases last cited are in point, as the language of the opinion in Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co. is so explicit as to leave nothing to be desired in furtherance of an endeavor to ascertain the rule in this state upon the subject treated so exhaustively in that case. A vigorous dissent from the conclusion reached in the opinion, upon views similar to those expressed in Healy v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra, was filed by one of the members of the court, but the principle announced has ever since remained the law of the state. The case was cited with approval in Mering v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, and was followed in Reeder v. Wells, Fargo & Co., 14 Cal. App. 790, 113 P. 342; Olcovich v. Grand Trunk R. Co., 179 Cal. 332, 176 P. 459; and Crenshaw Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co., 40 Cal. App. 603, 181 P. 252. It was mentioned in Walther v. Southern Pacific Co., 159 Cal. 769, 116 P. 51, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 235. The present controversy would seem to be ruled by Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co. Respondent endeavors to escape the principle stated in that case by means of a section of the Warehouse Act which reads:

"This act shall be so interpreted and construed as to effectuate its general purpose to make uniform the law of those states which enact it." Sec. 57.

The act has been adopted in a number of the states, and respondent cites, along with Healy v. New York Cent. R. Co., supra, cases from different jurisdictions which it is contended adhere to a rule in direct conflict with that announced by the carrier cases decided by the Supreme Court of this state and which are above listed. We have not halted to determine to what extent the courts of other states, in construing the provisions of their laws identical with or similar to section 3 of our Warehouse Act have aligned themselves together. We have not endeavored to ascertain to what extent they have attempted to make uniform, or have succeeded in making uniform, the law upon such a question as arises here. In view of the decision in Donlon Bros. v. Southern Pacific Co., supra, we have no interest in that question. The case is directly in point and applies in principle to section 3 of the Warehouse Act equally as it does to section 2175 of the Civil Code. If, because of the language of section 57 of the Warehouse Act, a rift is to be made in the law of bailments in this state, so that one rule shall obtain under section 3 of that act and an utterly different rule shall apply under section 2175 of the Civil Code, the chasm can be created only by the Supreme Court. We are bound by the line of decision laid by that tribunal. In view of the law as there expressed, the question as to how far it is necessary to go to satisfy the terms of section 57 of the Warehouse Act is a question for our court of last resort. In our opinion the contract limiting the liability of appellant to $25 per package of the goods stored by respondent with it was not invalid as being within the inhibition of section 3 of the Warehouse Act. This view requires a modification of the judgment.

Other points are made by appellant, but they are either concluded by our views upon questions which we have above determined, or they fall of their own weight.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the figures $759.97, and inserting therein in lieu thereof the figures $375.85. As so modified the judgment is affirmed.

74 Cal. App. 132

WIGMAN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5108.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 4, 1925.)

1. Courts ⟸80(1)—Pleading ⟸218(1)—Inferentially intended, under code rule requiring demurrer to specify grounds or be disregarded, that demurrer specifying grounds shall be considered on merits, and court rule could not override statute.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 421, providing that code rules govern sufficiency of pleadings, it is inferentially intended by section 431, providing that demurrer must specify grounds thereof or be disregarded, that if demurrer does specify grounds authorized by section 430, the defendant is entitled to have a ruling on the merits, and superior court rule 10, par. 8, requiring notation of authorities on demurrer, but containing no penalties for refusal, could not override the statute so as to permit the court to refuse to pass on the demurrer by reason of the omission of the notation.

2. Mandamus ⟸48—Mandamus to compel consideration of demurrer on merits will issue where court has refused to consider it at all.

Where court in form overruled demurrer, but in fact refused to consider it, mandamus to compel consideration of demurrer on merits will issue, since court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, has declined to perform an act which law enjoins as a duty resulting from its office.

Application by H. Wigman for writ of mandamus, directed to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for Los Angeles County and Hugh J. Crawford, Judge thereof, to compel consideration of demurrer on merits. Writ issued.

Crouch & Crouch, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Anne O'Keefe, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. [1] On application for writ of mandamus. The petitioner, as defendant in an action pending in the superior court, demurred to the complaint on several grounds stated in the demurrer, but did not note on the demurrer or file therewith any note or memorandum of the authorities in support thereof. Paragraph 8 of rule 10 of the superior court of Los Angeles county provides that a party demurring shall note on the demurrer the authorities in support thereof, or file a separate memorandum of such authorities. The rule does not declare what penalty or default shall result from failure to comply with these requirements. When the demurrer was called for hearing the judge called attention to the fact that the demurrer was not accompanied by any points and authorities. For that sole reason, without examining the demurrer itself, he refused to consider the demurrer, and entered an order overruling the same.

Section 421 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"The forms of pleading in civil actions, and the rules by which the sufficiency of the pleadings is to be determined, are those prescribed in this code."

Section 430 authorizes the defendant to demur to the complaint. Section 431 provides that the demurrer must distinctly specify the grounds upon which any of the objections to the complaint are taken. "Unless it does so, it may be disregarded." Inferentially it is thus intended, and in effect enacted, that, if the demurrer does distinctly specify any of the grounds of demurrer authorized by section 430, the defendant is entitled to have a ruling upon his pleading according to its merits.

In Klokke Investment Co. v. Superior Court, 39 Cal. App. 717, 179 P. 728, this court had under consideration an order for publication of summons, and a rule of the superior court which required that, where mailing a copy of summons and complaint was ordered, such mailed documents must be registered. The Code, in its provision for mailing of such documents, did not require that they be registered. This court held that, assuming that the case presented was one which required the mailing of the documents, the statute was satisfied when the mailing was made as therein required. "The acts necessary to give jurisdiction, as specified in an act of the Legislature, cannot be added to or limited by rule of court."

But in the case at bar we may assume that the rule under consideration, which directs the notation or filing of the authorities in support of a demurrer, is a valid rule, since it does not purport to be more than a rule of procedure upon a matter wherein the cause and the parties are within the jurisdiction of the court. The rule does not attempt to provide that a party failing to comply therewith shall be denied a ruling upon the merits of the demurrer. The case is not analogous to one which might arise under the provisions of section 527 of the Code of Civil Procedure, wherein it has been provided that where a temporary restraining order has been obtained, together with an order to show cause why a preliminary injunction should not be granted, the moving party must serve upon the opposing party a copy of his complaint, affidavits, and points and authorities, and that if he shall fail so to do within the time specified the court shall dissolve the temporary restraining order. Kelsey v. Superior Court, 40 Cal. App. 229, 235, 180 P. 662. Even if it be conceded that a rule might be sustained, imposing some such penalty or consequence for failure to file points and authorities in support of the demurrer, the fact is that the rule now under consideration does not contain any such provision. The rights of the demurring defendant rest completely and solely upon the sections of the Code relating to demurrers, to which we have referred. The defendant having filed a demurrer, such as the statute permits, and having attempted to present said demurrer, he is entitled to have a ruling upon the merits thereof.

[2] This is not a case where it is sought to obtain an order controlling the discretion of the court in its disposition of the matter before it. The order which the court made, although in form an order overruling the demurrer, was in effect a refusal to consider the demurrer at all. It is in this aspect alone of the case that the court has declined to perform "an act which the law specially enjoins, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085.

The demurrer to the petition herein is overruled.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

I concur: CURTIS, J.

JONES v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.
(Civ. 2896.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 28, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 24, 1925.)

1. Railroads ⟸400(6)—Whether signal was given held for jury.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, whether bell was rung or signal given held for jury.

2. Trial ⟸139(1)—Witnesses' negative testimony that they heard no signals and saw none, though opposed to positive testimony, presents a question for jury.

Negative testimony of witnesses who are in position to hear and to observe an accident, who declare they heard no signals and saw none, even if opposed to positive testimony that signals were given, presents a question for jury.

3. Railroads ⟸397(1)—Evidence held admissible to show lack of care of enginemen and speed.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, evidence that train stopped some 1,700 feet beyond intersection was admissible to show lack of care of enginemen and speed at which train was traveling.

4. Death ⟸58(1)—Presumption deceased used ordinary care.

Presumption is that deceased used ordinary care for his own safety.

5. Railroads ⟸396(1)—Person injured presumed to have seen train standing.

Where several trains, other than train striking employee of independent corporation repairing an intersection, had passed point at which he worked, and to which he gave right of way, it would be presumed that he saw train which struck him standing still at a water tank a short distance from the intersection.

6. Railroads ⟸383(2)—"Stop, look, and listen" rule inapplicable to trackmen.

The "stop, look, and listen" rule, applicable to travelers and to railroad employees not engaged in duties of their employment, cannot apply to persons lawfully at work repairing an intersection of railroads.

7. Negligence ⟸136(14, 26)—Negligence and contributory negligence for jury.

Questions of negligence and contributory negligence are for jury.

8. Railroads ⟸369(3)—Failure to give signals to trackmen negligence.

Under Civ. Code, § 486, all persons at or near railway crossings, not excluding employees or invitees rightfully engaged in repairing tracks, are entitled to warning signals, a failure to give which constitutes one kind of negligent operation of train.

9. Railroads ⟸369(3)—Trackmen entitled to benefit of signals.

While party injured must use reasonable, ordinary care, and cannot recover for injuries due to his own negligence, duty as to persons engaged in repairing tracks is reciprocal resting on railroad to use reasonable, ordinary care by means of such proper and adequate warnings and signals as will reasonably be adequate to avoid injury to persons lawfully on the tracks.

10. Railroads ⟸355(5) — Employee of independent corporation repairing track invitee.

Status of employee of independent corporation, engaged in repairing intersection of railroad when struck by train, was not that of a mere licensee nor of a trespasser, but analogous to that of an invitee.

11. Appeal and error ⟸1056(1)—Any error in excluding testimony whether witness saw enginemen after accident held not prejudicial.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, any error in excluding testimony whether witness saw enginemen of train striking decedent after the accident happened held not prejudicial.

12. Appeal and error ⟸1042(2)—Striking out of defendant's answer without notice held not prejudicial.

Court's act in striking out portion of defendant's answer without notice held not prejudicial, where appellant admitted that portion stricken out might not ordinarily have been relevant or admissible in evidence.

13. Jury ⟸137(2)—Court held not to have abused discretion in permitting plaintiff to pass peremptory challenge to jurors and later exercise it.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent, court held not to have abused its discretion in permitting plaintiff to pass her peremptory challenge to jurors and later exercise it.

14. Death ⟸66—Testimony as to deceased's appearance and health held admissible.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, testimony as to deceased's appearance and bodily health at various times and places prior to the accident held admissible.

15. Death ⟸61—Testimony as to decedent's appearance in hospital held admissible as bearing on severity of injuries.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, testimony as to decedent's appearance during time he was alive in hospital after accident held admissible as bearing on nature, extent, and severity of his injuries which resulted in his death.

16. Evidence ⊂⊃357—Letter from railroad to corporation, requesting track intersection to be repaired, held admissible as showing reason for presence of decedent on track.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, letter from defendant railroad to corporation, requesting that intersection be repaired, held admissible as showing reason for presence of decedent on crossing; it being immaterial that no written answer was sent, since no written reply was requested or expected.

17. Railroads ⊂⊃401(8) — Trial ⊂⊃194(17), 260(8)—Instruction held properly refused as being upon fact and not accurate definition and being sufficiently covered by another instruction.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction defining ordinary care held properly refused as being an instruction on fact and not accurate as a definition and being sufficiently covered by another instruction.

18. Trial ⊂⊃260(8)—Instruction on measure of damages held properly refused, where fully covered by another instruction.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction on measure of damages held properly refused, where fully covered by another instruction.

19. Trial ⊂⊃228(3), 260(10)—Instructions on measure of damages held properly refused, in view of other instructions, and as containing speculative references.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction on measure of damages held properly refused, where, in so far as it correctly stated the law, it was fully covered by other instructions, and contained speculative references whether deceased might have been liable to become wholly or partially dependent for support on plaintiffs.

20. Trial ⊂⊃253(4)—Instruction on contributory negligence held properly refused as omitting element of negligent contribution.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction that, if deceased in any manner contributed to accident which resulted in his death, verdict should be for defendant, held properly refused, since to bar a recovery deceased must have negligently contributed to happening of accident.

21. Trial ⊂⊃194(17)—Instruction on contributory negligence held properly refused as directing jury as to matters of fact.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction on deceased's contributory negligence held properly refused as directing jury as to matters of fact.

22. Railroads ⊂⊃370—Sounding whistle in cities not required.

Railroad is not required to sound whistle in cities, in view of Civ. Code, § 486, though there is no law forbidding that to be done.

23. Trial ⊂⊃260(8)—Instruction on duty of railroad to give signals held properly refused, in view of other instructions.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction on duty of railroad to sound bells or whistles when approaching a highway crossing held properly refused, in view of other instructions.

24. Trial ⊂⊃260(8)—Instruction on duty of railroad to maintain signals at place of accident held properly refused, in view of another instruction.

26. Trial ⊂⊃194(6)—Instruction as to positive and negative evidence held properly refused as invading province of jury.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction on relative weight of positive and negative evidence held properly refused as invading province of jury.

27. Railroads ⊂⊃383(2)—Instruction held erroneous as assuming it to be duty of section men at all times to look out.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction that railroads may rightfully assume that section men will look out for approach of trains, and that they owe no duty to warn them, held properly refused, as assuming it to be duty of section men at all times to look out for approach and passage of trains.

28. Railroads ⊂⊃381(2)—Section man must use reasonable care.

Section man must use reasonable ordinary care to protect himself from approach and passage of trains.

29. Railroads ⊂⊃400(10)—Contributory negligence of trackman held for jury.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, whether decedent exercised reasonable and ordinary care and watchfulness held for jury.

30. Railroads ⊂⊃383(2)—Trial ⊂⊃191(8)—Instruction held properly refused as assuming it to be duty of trackman to look out at all times, and that he knew trains were likely to pass.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction that a person working on a railroad track, where trains are likely to pass at short intervals, must exert due diligence to avoid such dangers, and that his failure to do so constitutes absolute negligence, held properly refused, as assuming it to be duty of decedent to look out at all times for approach of trains, and that decedent knew trains were likely to pass at short intervals.

31. Trial ⊂⊃191(8)—Instruction held properly refused as implying that decedent failed to heed warning of foreman and that his failure contributed to his death.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction that, if decedent's failure to heed foreman's warning to look out for trains contributed to his death, defendant would not be liable, held properly refused, as implying as matter of fact that decedent failed to heed warning of foreman, and that his failure contributed to his death.

32. Trial ⊂⊃228(3), 260(8)—Instruction held properly refused because of the use of word "approximately" and as being covered by other instructions.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction that, if decedent's neglect contributed approximately to accident resulting in his death, he could not recover, held properly refused because of use of "approximately" instead of "proximately" and as being covered by other instructions.

33. Railroads ⊂⊃383(2)—Instruction on duty of trackman to look held as incorrect.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction that one working on a railroad track must avail himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains, and that, if decedent taking such precautions would have seen or heard approaching trains, his death raised presumption that he did not take the required precautions, held properly refused as not embodying a correct statement of the law.

34. Trial ⊂⊃194(17)—Instruction that deceased did not look and listen for trains at all held properly refused on the facts.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction, which would have told jury as a matter of fact that decedent did not look and listen for trains at all, held properly refused as being on the facts.

35. Trial ⊂⊃194(17)—Instruction that deceased was negligent held properly refused as invading domain of fact.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction that deceased remained carelessly in place of danger, and was negligent, held properly refused as invading domain of fact.

36. Trial ⊂⊃194(17), 253(7)—Instruction held properly refused as invading province of jury and being hypothetically argumentative and not including all qualifying facts essential.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, instruction, implying that deceased did not use his eyes and ears while working, and that he failed to exercise due care, held properly refused as invading province of jury on matters of fact, and being hypothetically argumentative, and not including all qualifying facts essential.

37. Trial ⊂⊃191(8)—Instruction implying that decedent did not use all his faculties held properly refused as instructing on matters of fact.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction, implying that decedent did not use all his faculties, but merely listened and did not look, held properly refused as instructing on matters of fact.

38. Trial ⊂⊃260(8)—Instruction that defendant would not be liable though negligent held properly refused as being fully covered by another instruction.

In action for death of employee of independent corporation, making repairs on track intersection when struck by defendant's train, instruction that, if deceased was negligent and his negligence proximately contributed to his death, though defendant was negligent also, it would not be liable, held properly refused as being fully covered by another instruction.

39. Trial ⊂⊃260(4)—Instruction on credibility of witnesses held properly refused, where fully covered by other instructions.

Instruction on credibility of witnesses held properly refused, where fully covered by other instructions.

40. Trial ⊂⊃244(5)—Neither party entitled to have instructions as to credibility of particular witnesses.

Neither party to litigation is entitled to have instructions as to credibility of particular witnesses.

41. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1067—Refusal of instruction containing a part only of rule of statute held not prejudicial, where not sufficiently qualified.

In action for death of plaintiff's decedent when struck by defendant's train, refusal of instruction that there was no duty on part of defendant to blow its whistle when approaching crossing within corporate limits where accident occurred, held not prejudicial, since it contained a part only of the rule of Civ. Code, § 486, and was not sufficiently qualified.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ruth Jones against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 236 P. 336.

Levinsky & Jones, of Stockton, for appellant.

Cooley & Crowley and Cooley & Gallagher, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff, Ruth Jones, widow of B. B. Jones, deceased, and the mother of the plaintiffs Virginia Jones, Nannie Stevens, and Mrs. Fletcher Stevens, prosecutes this action against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation. Walter W. Webb and Charles P. Alexander, respectively fireman and locomotive engineer on extra freight No. 2327, also are defendants, but were not served with summons; this action, therefore, being against the Southern Pacific Company alone, to recover damages for the death of said B. B. Jones, alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of defendant on the 4th day of August, 1921, at the city of Lodi, Cal. Jones was a track laborer in the employ of the Central California Traction Company, a corporation, but working on the tracks of the appellant. Before submission, the cause was abandoned by the plaintiffs Virginia Jones, Nannie Stevens, and Mrs. Fletcher Stevens, and dismissed as to them by order of court. Code Civ. Proc. § 581, subd. 4.

The jury returned a general verdict, in the sum of $10,000, for the plaintiff, Ruth Jones, against the Southern Pacific Company, appellant herein, and also returned answers upon submitted special issues, the first six of which having been requested by the plaintiff and the remaining six by the defendant. Those special issues and answers were found and returned, over the signature of the foreman as follows:

"No. 1. Was the manner of operating the freight train involved in the accident careless and negligent? Ans. Yes.

"No. 2. Was the death of B. B. Jones caused by the careless and negligent operation of the freight train involved in the action? Ans. Yes.

"No. 3. Did the engineer in charge of the engine keep such a lookout as would be kept by an ordinarily prudent man, under the same circumstances, while traveling from the water tank to the crossing at East Lodi avenue, in the city of Lodi? Ans. No.

"No. 4. Did B. B. Jones come to his death by reason of any negligent act or omission on the part of the engineer? Ans. Yes.

"No. 5. Did the fireman, in the engine involved in the accident, keep such a lookout as would be kept by an ordinarily prudent man under the same circumstances, while traveling from the water tank to the crossing at East Lodi avenue, in the city of Lodi? Ans. No.

"No. 6. Did B. B. Jones come to his death by reason of any negligent act or omission on the part of the fireman? Ans. Yes.

"No. 7. Was the defendant Southern Pacific Company, as to B. B. Jones, negligent in failing to maintain an automatic or other signal at, or near, the point of the accident complained of? Ans. No.

"No. 8. Was the defendant Southern Pacific Company, as to decedent, B. B. Jones, negligent in failing to keep or maintain a flagman or watchman at the crossing where the accident complained of occurred at the time of said accident? Ans. No.

"No. 9. (A) Was the locomotive as to which plaintiffs charge defendant with negligent operation equipped with a bell, as defined in the instructions I have given? (B) Was that bell rung at a distance of at least 80 rods from the place where the Southern Pacific Company's Railroad crossed the highway on, or near, which B. B. Jones was killed? (C) Was it kept ringing until it crossed said crossing? Ans. (A) Yes. Ans. (B) No. Ans. (C) No.

"No. 10. Did the decedent, B. B. Jones, use ordinary care in looking out for the approach of the locomotive and train which it is alleged caused his death? Ans. Yes.

"No. 11. Was the decedent, B. B. Jones, warned by his foreman to look out for trains using the tracks on or near the point where B. B. Jones was working? Ans. Yes.

"No. 12. Was there anything that would have prevented the deceased, B. B. Jones, from seeing the approaching train, if he had looked in the direction from which the train was coming? Ans. No."

The evidence is before us in a bill of exceptions with 139 specifications of error. Counsel for appellant, even in the amplitude of indefatigable industry, has not argued every specification. We have examined all of them, however.

The railroad track of the Southern Pacific Company is located on Sacramento street in the city of Lodi. The street and track extend in a northerly and southerly direction. Lodi avenue crosses Sacramento street at right angles, and upon it are located car tracks of the Central California Traction Company. This railroad crossing is a public street crossing within the corporate limits of the city of Lodi. It appears to be the duty of the traction company to keep the intersection in repair at its own expense, subject to the rights of the Southern Pacific Company.

On July 30, 1921, the superintendent of the Southern Pacific Company, G. E. Gaylord, sent a letter to the Central California Traction Company, for the attention particularly of J. J. Hooper, its superintendent; a copy is as follows (letter heading omitted):

"Gentlemen: Attention Mr. Hooper. Crossing at Lodi avenue, our main line, Lodi, so badly out of line, considered necessary this afternoon to place 8-mile slow order over same. Hope you can arrange to have your forces drive this crossing into line, calling upon my section forces at Lodi for such assistance as they may be able to render you.

"Yours truly, G. E. Gaylord."

This notification seems never to have been replied to in writing, but on August 4, 1921, the Central California Traction Company sent its gang of workmen, under section foreman H. H. Woodside, to said crossing to do the work as directed in the notification. They had been working at the crossing or the immediate vicinity about 2 hours before the accident mentioned in the complaint. B. B. Jones, a member of that section gang, had worked as such for Central California Traction Company about 3 months. The entire crew, including Jones, after working at that place a while, was sent to other points along the track near by, when Jones, by order of the foreman, returned to the intersection to continue work at that point.

From the crossing looking south, one's view of the track is unobstructed for 2 miles or more, except when trains may be passing thereon, and one on an approaching engine has an unobstructed view of the crossing and any one upon it a like distance.

Mr. Woodside, the section foreman, testified that on that morning he had warned all of the section men, including the deceased, saying, "Whatever you do, look out for those trains," and, further, that he had repeated this two or three times the same morning. That admonition expressed the duty of every ordinarily prudent person in such a place to exercise reasonable care for his own safety.

Jones was a man 65 years and 6 months of age, in sound health, and of normal faculties, and the evidence did not disclose he had defect either of vision or hearing. The particular work he was doing when the accident occurred was digging with pick and shovel a jack hole under one of the track rails to prepare a foundation for a track-lifting implement.

While so at work, in a stooping position, with his back toward the rails and the approaching train, his hearing probably affected by sounds of other nearby moving trains, he was struck by the freight train of defendant, receiving injuries from which he died, one leg being almost amputated by the wheels of the train, and his skull fractured. A witness stated that he observed the iron step of several of the passing cars strike Jones upon the head as the latter, after being run down, tried to raise himself from the ground.

Shortly before the fatality, the train, not running on regular schedule, was stopped at a water tank situated on the main line, 1,534 feet south of the point of accident. It remained there for approximately 10 minutes, then proceeded on its north-bound journey (east-bound in railroad parlance) at a speed of 6 or 8 miles per hour to and past the point of accident. The time occupied in traveling the distance from the water tank to the crossing might have been a minimum of 2 minutes and 15 seconds, or a maximum of 4 minutes.

There is a conflict in the testimony as to whether or not any whistle was sounded or bell rung as the train left the water tank and approached the crossing. This conflict will be fully examined.

Both appellant and respondent in argument agree that under the facts no features are presented to bring this case within the rule of the last clear chance. It will be unnecessary, therefore, to pay any attention to that rule. It is conceded that Jones did not see the train immediately before it ran upon him, and that neither the engineer nor the fireman observed Jones at the crossing during any time while the engine traveled from the water tank to the intersection.

Appellant earnestly contends it was in no wise guilty of negligence in the operation of the train, or in causing the injuries to the deceased, but that his death was directly and proximately due to his negligence in failing to exercise ordinary care for his own safety; that, if appellant was negligent in any manner or at all, nevertheless his death was directly and proximately due to his contributory negligence.

Respondent argues that appellant was guilty of negligent operation of its train, resting the argument partly upon the charge that signals were not given, as required by section 486, Civil Code.

Defendant's fireman, engineer, and brakemen testified that the whistle was sounded a number of times, and a bell of the requisite weight was automatically ringing from the time the train left the water tank until it passed the crossing and intersection at Lodi avenue.

About the time of the accident, there were switch engines and trains of the Southern Pacific Company being operated and worked in the yards of said company at Lodi; the said yards extending on the east side of the main track both north and south of the crossing, wherein are four so-called house tracks, upon which, at the time, the Central California Traction Company also was moving cars.

Jones was not working within the train-yard itself, but on the main line track, which bounds the west side of the switch yard, and the train which struck him was a through freight, bound east.

Opposing the testimony of the trainmen as to signals, the witness T. P. Trick testified in part as follows:

"Q. Did you hear anything prior to the time you noticed the train? A. The reason we looked, we heard the train noise, and then we looked around, and then we seen the train. I didn't hear anything else; I didn't hear any noise of any kind before I saw the train, except the train noise, and didn't hear any other noise of any kind made by that train within 2 minutes of the time I first saw the train. * * * What I mean by the train noise was, you always hear noise when the train goes by, feel it or hear it when it is so close, and I heard nothing else. When we worked there we pay attention to our work and to nothing else. There was no steam coming out of the engine on the side I was on. * * * When I stated that all the freight trains that passed that crossing made the same noise, I referred to the noise that it makes when it passes a crossing by the cars. I didn't mean that I didn't pay any attention to anything else except that work."

This witness testified he was at the traction depot, about 100 or 120 feet from the crossing, at the time of the accident.

The witness A. D. Buller, who was 25 or 50 feet from the crossing when the accident occurred, testified:

"The noise the train was making was just the noise the wheels will make when they run over the track, wheels—railroad car wheels—will make a noise when they run on the track; that is the only noise I heard.

"Q. Did the engine make any other noise? A. No, sir.

"Q. * * * During the time you were walking from the place where you first saw Mr. Jones, did you hear the engine of the train make any noise other than that noise which you say was made by the wheels on the track? A. No, sir."

It appears to have been understood at the trial that the foregoing evidence was introduced for the purpose of showing no signals or warnings were given of the approach of the train. That the attorney for defendant so understood it is shown by the cross-examination of the witness.

Mr. Levinsky said: "I am cross-examining him on the basis of his claiming he didn't hear that whistle." In his direct examination the witness did not say he did not hear the whistle, so counsel's remark must have had reference to the statement of the witness that he heard no noise except those he described. If counsel for defendant understood the effect of the witness' testimony to be that he did not hear any warning signal, it is probable that the jury so understood it and that the witness meant to be so understood. Counsel for defendant had objected to the question asking directly whether the bell was rung, on the ground that it was leading and suggestive. The objection was overruled, and such ruling is assigned as error on appeal. Later in the trial counsel for plaintiff seems to have so formed his questions as to avoid the objection made, and it is fair to infer that all persons connected with the trial understood that the questions and answers concerning noise had reference to the matter of warning signals. It also may be noted in folio 529, the following answers were given:

"Mr. Levinsky (cross-examination of witness Buller): Q. This train may have whistled for this crossing and you did not hear it? A. And it may not; I know it did not. I have my normal hearing and every train in Lodi when it whistles if I am away even half a mile, I think I hear it if it whistles.

"Q. Because you did not hear it is the only reason you say it did not whistle, is that correct? A. Well, is there another way to know it, could I see it, if it whistles?

"Q. Please answer my question. A. Well, it is just that, I have another reason—if it whistles it blows the steam up from the whistle, I didn't see that, I didn't see even the steam of the whistle."

Herbert Waite testified as follows:

"It might have been 40 feet, it might be 30 feet, something like that; I couldn't tell how far I was from the crossing.

"Q. At the time the train passed you, was it making any noise? A. Well, some noise, of course. I don't know—I don't know how to answer the question. Noise ordinarily that it would make going by a place, I should imagine. I know—it made a noise, that is all. I couldn't tell what particular part of the train made a noise; the noise sounded like the ordinary noise that any train would make—oh, it made a noise, yes, but I couldn't describe it. I didn't hear any bell ring as the train passed me.

"Q. State whether or not, within 2 minutes of the time you heard the train passing you, you heard any bell ring. A. Well, that I couldn't say, because I never noticed the train until it got right there. At the time the train passed me, I don't remember of hearing any whistle.

"Q. Do you remember hearing either any bell or any whistle within 2 or 3 minutes of the time the train passed you? A. Well, I never noticed the train until it got right there. No; I didn't notice it to remember of."

[1] It seems clear that this testimony is sufficient to raise a conflict as against the testimony of the train crew, who testified to the giving of the signals and presented a question for the jury's determination, and would be sufficient, if believed, to justify the inference that no bell was rung or signal given.

[2] In this connection it may be said that negative testimony of witnesses who are in a position to hear and to observe, who declare they heard no signals and saw none, even as opposed to positive testimony that signals were given, presents a question to be submitted to the jury, and it has been held such negative evidence may be sufficient to sustain a verdict. Jones on Evidence, § 898; volume 23, C. J., § 1787, where many cases upon the question are cited.

We find in Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 711, a holding which in principle we deem applicable, as follows:

"But we think it must be held that there was enough in the evidence to justify the jury in finding that the motorman was negligent in not giving proper warning, by bell or whistle, of his approach. It is true that the only evidence that he did not give such warning was negative, consisting of the statements of the people in the automobile that they heard no signal. But, if they were so situated, as they undoubtedly were, as to have been able to hear a bell or whistle sounded from the motor car, their failure to hear is some evidence that no such signal was given [citing cases]. That there was positive testimony to the contrary does not conclusively establish that a warning was given. It creates merely a conflict of testimony, which is finally resolved, so far as this court is concerned, by the verdict of the jury. This circumstance alone supports the finding of negligence."

In Exposita v. United Ry. Co., 42 Cal. App. 320, 183 P. 576, wherein a verdict for defendant was returned, the court, in speaking of negative testimony, held:

"The defendant offered the only kind of evidence available in the nature of the case. Its negative character affected its weight and sufficiency. Conclusive proof is never necessary to justify the verdict of a jury. The jury had the right to draw its own inferences from the evidence."

Burke v. Brooklyn W. & W. Co., 86 App. Div. 296, 83 N. Y. S. 795, holds:

"Whether the bell of defendant's engine was rung as the train approached the place of the accident is a question for the jury, though five persons testified it was rung, all being employees of defendant, and four of them engaged in the management of the train, and only two testified they did not hear the bell, but only the rumbling of the cars, they being near the train, and the attention of one of them being attracted, when it was some distance away, to the danger of children approaching the track."

[3] The defendant company's negligence is also predicated upon the alleged failure of the enginemen to maintain a lookout as they passed from the water tank to and over the crossing. The testimony of the engineer and fireman disclosed that they observed many persons, presumably section laborers, along and close to the track between those points, but did not see the man Jones at work at the intersection of the tracks, and did not know of the happening of the accident until after they had brought the train to a standstill after receiving stop signals. The day was a bright, clear day. The train stopped some 1,700 feet beyond the intersection, to the north. Evidence of this fact was clearly admissible as tending to some extent to show a lack of care of the enginemen, as well, perhaps, as to throw light upon the speed at which the train was traveling.

From these undisputed facts the jury may well have inferred negligence on the part of the men in charge of the operation of the train.

[4, 5] The presumption is, of course, that the deceased used ordinary care for his own safety. Olsen v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 20, 204 P. 393; Green v. Southern Pacific Co., 53 Cal. App. 194, 199 P. 1059. In support of this presumption there is evidence, as hereinbefore noticed, that several trains other than this special freight had passed the point where Jones worked, to which he, in the exercise of ordinary care, gave the right of way. Undoubtedly Jones saw, or will be presumed to have seen, the train standing still while at the water tank. He undoubtedly then continued with his work under the assumption that trains would not be operated without warning signals to give him an opportunity to protect himself and avoid being run down. Kiye Konno v. Northern Pac. R. Co. (Wash.) 221 P. 318. That case cites Anest v. Columbia & P. S. R. Co., 89 Wash. 609, 154 P. 1100, which was a case where a track inspector was run down, while riding on a speeder, by an engine which was proceeding, tender first, wherein the evidence was held to warrant a finding that those in charge of the engine were guilty of negligence in not keeping a proper lookout.

We find California authorities we deem squarely in point in Egan v. Southern Pac. Co., 15 Cal. App. 766, 115 P. 939, and Barboza v. Pacific Portland Cement Co., 162 Cal. 36, 120 P. 767.

In the Egan Case the injured person was an employee of the defendant. Here the deceased was an employee of an independent corporation which had been requested by defendant to send its track workers to the intersection to make necessary repairs. There the train was backed upon the workman without warning or placing any one upon the rear of the train for the purpose of keeping a lookout and giving warnings. Here the train was not backing but advancing, with the engineer and fireman in the engine at the front of the train, where there was full opportunity, in the exercise of ordinary care, to have observed the injured party and to have given warning. Nevertheless, they failed either to see or to warn. The engineer knew there were persons engaged in work near to and upon the track.

It is true that, if the deceased had looked, he could have seen the approaching train, and one step would have taken him to safety, as the jury found in its answer to the special issue No. 12, but, shortly before the accident, he had seen the train motionless 1,534 feet away from him. No warnings, under the finding of the jury, were given. There was nothing to communicate an intention of immediate movement upon the part of those in charge of the train.

We quote from the Egan Case the following:

"Plaintiff was there to work, and to this work it was his duty to give attention. Having first exercised his sense of sight and no imminent danger being evident, it was his duty to resume work, and he was rightfully upon the track. If it be said that it is the duty of one thus employed to be constantly exercising his sense of sight, it is the equivalent of saying that he must not work when a train is standing upon the track above him, for he could not work and at the same time observe the approach of the train. One thus employed upon the track occupies a very different position from the pedestrian or stranger entering upon the track and using the same as a thoroughfare or seeking to cross the same. In both instances care and the exercise of the senses are required before entering upon the place of danger, but the duty which devolves upon the one to continue the exercise of his sense of sight should not be held to devolve with the same strictness upon the other employed by the railroad company to work upon the track. Plaintiff being rightfully upon the track and in the performance of the duty enjoined upon him by the defendant in the exercise of an employment upon said track, had a right to assume that the train would not be backed down upon him without warning, and it should not be said that he contributed to his own injury in the doing of that which his employment required that he should do. Morgan v. Robinson Co., 157 Cal. 348, 107 P. 695. The evidence supported the findings implied by the verdict, and we see no error in the action of the court denying a new trial."

If we substitute in the next to the last of the preceding sentences the word "run" for the word "backed," the foregoing quotation fits both the facts and the principles of law involved herein most perfectly.

In the Barboza Case, supra, the plaintiff, as administrator, brought suit against the defendant, cement company, for the negligent killing of his intestate. The deceased was a laborer employed by the Southern Pacific Company and, while engaged in repairing the track near Tolenas station, he was struck and killed by defendant company's train, made up of a number of cars propelled from the rear by a locomotive. Among the averments of negligence was that defendant failed to ring a bell or blow a whistle, which averment the jury in its verdict found to be true.

"No bell was rung nor was the whistle blown. There was a brakeman on a car next the engine and another on the third car from the forward end of the train. From this position the second brakeman saw that the deceased and the others were in danger and signaled the engineer to stop, but it was then too late to bring the train to a complete standstill in time to prevent the injury. There was evidence that the train, at the time it was bearing down on the deceased, was running at the rate of eight miles an hour. A through train of the Southern Pacific Company was at the same time passing upon the main line track and the noise produced by this through train was, as the jury may have well inferred, sufficient to prevent the men working on the track from hearing the approach of defendant's train. The engineer in charge of the latter had seen the men at work when he had brought his train into Tolenas and knew, or might have known, that they were still at work when he started to return. The point where plaintiff was working was within the limits of the Southern Pacific yard at Tolenas, but it was not at the end of the yard equipped for switching work, or in which the switching was usually done.

"In this state of the evidence we cannot assent to appellant's contention that, as matter of law, it should be held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence. Whether or not, under all the circumstances, a due regard for the safety of the men on the track required the defendant to give warning of the approach of its train by ringing a bell or blowing a whistle, or by having upon the front car of its train a man who could see persons or objects on the track, were questions of fact to be determined by the jury. It is no doubt true that the rules with reference to the necessity of giving warning of an approaching train by means of whistles or bells or otherwise, are not always applicable to engines and cars which are being moved about the tracks of railroad yards while switching. Aerkfetz v. Humphreys, 145 U. S. 418, 36 L. Ed. 758, 12 S. Ct. 835; Crows v. New York C. R. R., 70 Hun, 37, 23 N. Y. S. 1100. But, as we have seen, the point where the train struck Augustus was not within that part of the yard devoted to switching and the train had completed its switching and had started on its return run to Cement. Furthermore, the noise produced by the passing train was a factor which the jury might well have considered as requiring greater effort to warn persons on the track than would have been required if the conditions had been such that the approach of defendant's train itself might have been more readily heard.

"Nor can it be said, as matter of law, that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence. A man working upon a railroad track is, of course, bound to take reasonable precautions for his own safety. Knowing that trains are likely to pass, he must use the care which an ordinarily prudent man would exercise to avoid being struck by such train. But what is reasonable care under the circumstances is, like the question of defendant's negligence, primarily to be determined by the jury. The work in which Augustus was employed required that he be in the middle of the track and in a stooping position. Obviously he could not perform his work properly if he were constantly looking to see whether a train was approaching. In view of the further fact that the noise of the passing train interfered with his opportunity of hearing defendant's train, the question whether he was guilty of negligence in not becoming aware of the cars bearing down upon him was properly submitted to the jury. On the facts bearing upon both these questions, i. e., the negligence of the defendant and the contributory negligence of the plaintiff, the case is very similar to Egan v. Southern Pacific Co., 15 Cal. App. 766, 115 P. 939."

The jury was justified, therefore, under the evidence in this case, in inferring negligence on the part of defendant in two respects, viz.: Failure of the enginemen to maintain a reasonable lookout, and also failure to give the proper crossing signals and warnings.

[6] Many other authorities may be cited to support the proposition, under more or less similar circumstances to those shown here, that the common "stop, look, and listen" rule applicable to travelers and to railroad employees not engaged in the duties of their employment cannot apply to persons lawfully at work repairing an intersection of railroads. Ala. T. N. R. Co. v. Huggins, 205 Ala. 80, 87 So. 546; Louisville N. R. Co. v. Heidtmueller, 206 Ala. 29, 89 So. 191.

[7] Questions of negligence and contributory negligence are for the jury. Southern R. Co. v. Wright, 207 Ala. 411, 92 So. 654; Cincinnati, etc., R. v. Owsley, 191 Ky. 661, 231 S. W. 210; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Heidtmueller, 206 Ala. 29, 89 So. 191; Polluck v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 44 S. D. 249, 183 N. W. 859, which distinguishes between the rules applicable to licensees and invitees.

Lamport v. S. P. Co., 183 Cal. 326, 191 P. 527, involves the point that it was a question for the jury to determine whether or not the failure of the trainmen to observe and warn the deceased of danger was negligence. In that case a switchman had been run down by the backing upon him of a train, while he was engaged in signaling the engineer of another train, where there was evidence that the deceased was directly on a line between the engineer and the switchman of the other train, so as to be clearly in the field of their vision. And, of course, if he, the injured man, had looked, as in the instant case, he could have seen the approaching train. The court held:

"No argument is required to demonstrate the proposition that under these circumstances they should have observed him and warned him of the danger, or that it was at least a question for the jury to determine whether or not their failure to do so was negligence. It is obvious from the mere statement of the facts that the evidence tended to show negligence, if it did not demonstrate it absolutely."

Lawrence et al. v. S. P. Co., 189 Cal. 434, 208 P. 966 (a collision case between an auto and a train), holds that the question of contributory negligence in failing to stop, look, and listen was a question of fact for the jury's determination, and a verdict against the United States Director of Railroads was sustained.

Roberts v. S. P. R. Co., 54 Cal. App. 315, 201 P. 958, wherein the order granting a new trial against the defendant was affirmed, the court reiterates the general rule that the question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury under proper instructions, and is not one of law, save in those cases in which, judged in the light of common knowledge and experience, there is a standard of prudence to which all persons similarly situated must conform. In such case failure to reach that standard is contributory negligence as a matter of law.

In our opinion those two California cases, Egan v. S. P. and Barboza v. Portland C. Co., supra, are determinative of almost every issue presented on the argument by the appellant. Some of the authorities relied upon most confidently are distinguished in the Barboza Case. Appellant cites many cases of pedestrians and travelers, wherein the "stop, look, and listen" rule has been applied, and argues their applicability to the case at bar. He also cites other cases in support of the proposition "that the agents and servants in charge of railway trains owe no duty to look out for the safety of brakemen and section hands." That last quotation is from Kirkland v. Bixby et al., 282 Mo. 462, 222 S. W. 462. The longer quotation from the same case, made by counsel for appellant in his brief, in some respects was not accurately made, nor is the application of the rule as broad as appellant seems to regard it, for the court in that case applied it only as to those cases where the "humanitarian rule" is not pleaded nor invoked. That action was one under the federal Employers' Liability Act. The court there said:

"The rule in this state requires section men to protect themselves from passing trains. In other words, the train crew, so far as section men are concerned, have the right to expect a clear track, and the humanitarian rule (when violated) is the only salvation for the unfortunate section man."

In Moore v. St. Louis S. F. Ry. Co. (Mo. App.) 267 S. W. 945, it is held:

"At the foundation of the humanitarian rule lies the principle that no one has the right knowingly or negligently to injure another when he knows, or should know, if reasonably careful, that his fellow is in danger of injury at his hands and he possesses the means of removing the danger."

[8] In California, as we have shown, the humanitarian rule, in principle at least, has been crystallized in the statute and in the best-considered cases. In the instant case, it was the duty of appellant's employees in charge of its train to keep a vigilant lookout. The line of demarcation between this and traveler's crossing cases has been shown. Under section 486, Civil Code, all persons at or near railway crossings, not excluding employees or invitees, rightfully engaged in repairing tracks, are entitled to warning signals, a failure to give which constitutes one kind of negligent operation of trains.

[9, 10] The authorities cited by counsel are not necessarily in conflict with the well-settled and reasonable rule applicable in a case like this that, while the party injured must use reasonable, ordinary care and cannot recover for injuries due to his own negligence, the duty to use reasonable care in such a relation as shown by the evidence herein is a reciprocal duty, resting upon the railroad company to use reasonable, ordinary care by means of such proper and adequate warnings and signals as will reasonably be adequate to avoid injury to the persons lawfully employed upon the tracks. The status of the deceased, Jones, was not that of a mere licensee, nor of a trespasser, but analogous at least to that of an invitee. The case of Midland Valley R. Co. v. Kellogg et al., 106 Okl. 237, 233 P. 716, holds:

"In the case of a licensee, who is on the premises by invitation, express or implied, the company is required to exercise that degree of care and watchfulness to protect against injury to such person that is commensurate with the probability that such person may be upon its track at that point."

"In the case of a bare or mere licensee, being one whose presence on the premises is merely tolerated, the company, as in the case of a trespasser, owes no duty except not wantonly or willfully to injure such person after his perilous position is discovered."

We may remark that Soares v. Davis, 64 Cal. App. 486, 222 P. 165, is easily distinguishable upon the facts from the case on appeal. In that case, the undisputed evidence established that warning signals were given. There was conflicting testimony as to some signals, but as to other signals there was no conflict; for which reason the court held that, as a matter of law, the negligence of the deceased had been conclusively established.

The case of Neidlein v. Southern Pacific Co., 180 Cal. 63, 179 P. 191, which cites with approval Aerkfetz v. Humphreys et al., supra, and other cognate authorities cited by counsel for appellant, is not at all, in its facts or guiding principles, authority, under the evidence, in the case at bar. There the accident was in what is strictly a switchyard, and the injured party was a switchman working in the freight shed at Sacramento within the yard when crushed between two cars, in a position where the enginemen neither knew nor had reason to suspect him to be.

The accident, as pointed out, in the instant case occurred on the main through line of the defendant company, on the western border of its train yard. The injuries were inflicted by an extra through freight. The deceased Jones was known or should have been known by the defendant to be working at the precise point where he was killed. There is a marked distinction in the decisions between the two kinds of cases. Egan v. S. P. Co., supra; Barboza v. Portland Cement Co., supra.

The case of Flowers v. Virginian R. Co., 135 Va. 367, 116 S. E. 672, was one wherein a railroad employee of an independent contractor was struck by an engine of the defendant while he was leaving work; he was held to be an invitee, not a mere licensee. We quote:

"While it is the duty of employees of an independent contractor employed on or along a railroad to use reasonable care for their safety, yet as between them and the railroad company this duty is reciprocal, and in such cases the law does not require of such employees at work on or along the tracks to maintain a constant lookout for approaching trains, and at the same time pursue their labors, but does require of the operatives of trains an active vigilance, and to give reasonable danger signals to attract the attention of the persons so employed, to avoid doing injury to them, and to enable them to get out of the way of moving trains. Instructions to the jury to the contrary were rightfully rejected."

Additional cases supporting our views are Wineinger v. Union Pac. Co. (C. C. A.) 276 F. 65; Cubitt v. N. Y. C. R. Co., 278 Pa. 366, 123 A. 308; Hastings v. Southern Shore R. Co., 272 Pa. 212, 116 A. 155; Wigmore on Evidence (2d Ed.) 1068, par. 664; McDonald v. N. Y. C. R. R., 186 Mass. 474, 72 N. E. 55; Thompson v. L. A. R. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709; Bethlehem Steel Co. v. Raymond Concrete Pile Co., 141 Md. 67, 118 A. 279; Dempsey v. N. Y. Central, 81 Hun, 156, 30 N. Y. S. 724; Milauskis v. Terminal R., 286 Ill. 547, 122 N. E. 81. Duty to exercise ordinary care to invitee: Ingram v. Rutland Co., 86 Vt. 550, 86 A. 813; Ill. Central R. R. v. Frelka, 110 Ill. 498.

We have examined with care appellant's argument on alleged errors occurring during the trial. We believe that, as to all the preliminary rulings included in the bill of exceptions prior to the actual commencement of the trial, covering the questions of the alleged promise of counsel for respondent to dismiss the action as against the defendants Webb and Alexander, the denial of the first motion for continuance and the later granting of the same, and continuance of the case from the 23d day of October, 1923, to the 1st day of November, 1923, the objection to the impanelment of the jury and taking testimony, preliminarily, of Mrs. Ruth Jones, the denial of the motion to remove the cause to the federal courts, and all of the matters covered in the first 23 specifications, the rulings of the trial court were free from any error affecting the substantial rights of appellant.

[11] Very many of the specifications were to alleged errors of the court sustaining or overruling objections to questions merely because of their form as to being leading or suggestive. In this respect, wherever such objections were sustained to appellant's questions, in every instance the evidence sought to be elicited was put before the jury by further questions; hence nothing of importance was excluded. Where appellant's objections were overruled, the questions were not harmfully leading. It appears to us that some of the specifications, even if technically well taken, were almost frivolous. To illustrate: The witness Woodside stated:

"I don't know that I ever looked at the engineer [referring to seeing the engine as it passed him about the time of the accident].

"Q. By Mr. Gallagher: You don't remember seeing him at the place where Mr. Jones was lying beside track at any time, do you? A. No; I didn't see him pass the crossing.

"Q. You didn't see him pass the crossing. Did you see him at any time after he passed the crossing? A. Of course, I seen him after he passed; somebody drawed my attention to him.

"Q. I will ask you if he came back to the point of the collision.

"Mr. Levinsky: Object to that as incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, occurring after the accident happened.

"The Court: Answer the question; objection overruled. A. I don't know.

"Mr. Gallagher: Q. Did you see him there? A. No I did not, I was there after the accident happened.

"Q. Did you see the fireman there?

"Mr. Levinsky: The same objection.

"The Court: Objection overruled. To which defendant excepted.
"A. No, I did not."

If it be conceded that the rulings on the foregoing questions were erroneous, it is impossible to deduce that they were prejudicial.

[12] Appellant predicates error on the action of the trial court in striking out a portion of the answer of the defendant Southern Pacific Company without notice. He admits that the portion stricken out might not ordinarily have been relevant or admissible in evidence, yet insists that error was committed. If the striking out was error, then, under that admission of counsel, we determine no substantial injury could have resulted from the order.

[13] The objections to the impanelment of the jury were not well taken. The permission given respondent to pass her peremptory challenge to the jurors and later exercise such peremptory challenge was not error. The ruling was within the discretion of the court. No abuse of discretion was shown. Silcox v. Lang, 78 Cal. 118, at page 123, 20 P. 297; Vallejo, etc., R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, at page 559, 147 P. 238.

[14, 15] The objections to the relatives of the deceased testifying to his appearance and bodily health were properly overruled, as were the objections to the witness testifying as to the appearance of the deceased at various times and places prior to the accident and after the accident while in the hospital. His appearance during the time he was alive in the hospital was certainly material as bearing on the nature, extent and severity of his injuries which resulted in his death.

[16] The objections to the admission in evidence of the letter from the superintendent of the Southern Pacific Company to the Central California Traction Company were properly overruled. It is important to show the reason for the presence of Jones upon the crossing. The fact that no written answer was sent is of no importance. No written reply was requested, and there is nothing in the letter to indicate one was expected.

We believe no errors affecting the substantial rights of appellant were committed by the trial court in any of its rulings concerning the admissibility or rejection of testimony. Our attention has not been called to any material evidence which was excluded, nor to any at all prejudicial which was admitted.

We pass now to a consideration of the instructions.

Instruction numbered 4, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"The court further instructs you that ordinary care is that degree of care which an ordinarily prudent person, situated as the decedent, B. B. Jones, was, as shown by the evidence and circumstances, at or about the time of the accident, would usually exercise for his own safety."

[17] The refusal of that instruction was proper. It is an instruction upon fact, and is not accurate as a definition, because of the use of the word "usually" instead of the more appropriate word "ordinarily" or "reasonably" in the last line. The subject of ordinary care is sufficiently covered in defendant's instructions numbered 2 and 3, defining negligence and contributory negligence, which were given.

Instruction numbered 6, which appellant argued was refused, was given by the court as requested.

Instruction numbered 7, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you should believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs have proven their case by a preponderance of the evidence, and if you believe that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages, then I instruct you that the plaintiffs can recover only for the pecuniary loss suffered by them through the death of B. B. Jones, and that the loss of society, comfort, and care suffered through the bereavement can only be considered for the purpose of estimating such pecuniary loss, and that you cannot consider the loss of society, comfort, and care suffered through the bereavement for the purpose of adding anything more than pecuniary loss. And I further instruct you that you cannot and must not consider grief, mental suffering, and sorrow, or either of them, in arriving at the amount of damages, and that you cannot allow exemplary damages, or vindictive damages."

[18] There was no error in the refusal because the subject of the instruction (the measure of damages) was fully covered in defendant's instruction numbered 5, which was given.

Instruction numbered 8, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you find from the evidence in this case that any plaintiff is entitled to damages, then I charge you that in determining the pecuniary loss and injury sustained by any such plaintiff, if any, you should take into consideration in determining the amount of such pecuniary loss and injury the age of said deceased, and the length of time which he would reasonably have been, according to the evidence in this case, expected to live, had this accident not happened, and also for how long during the continued expectancy of the life of said deceased would he have been able to earn money by his physical exertion and labor, and whether or not said deceased might have, through age or sickness, been likely to have become wholly or partially dependent for support upon the plaintiffs, or any of them."

[19] There was no error in the refusal, because, in so far as it correctly states the law, it was fully covered by other instructions given, viz. in instruction numbered 5; and it contains speculative references whether or not the deceased "might have, through age or sickness, been likely to become wholly or partially dependent for support upon the plaintiffs." This speculative portion warranted its refusal.

Instruction numbered 5, referred to heretofore, given at the request of appellant, copied for convenient inspection, is as follows:

"If you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant Southern Pacific Company is liable for any damages as to Ruth Jones, one of the plaintiffs in this case, which were caused by the death of said B. B. Jones, I then charge you that in determining and assessing such damages, you shall assess the same at the present worth of the pecuniary loss and injury sustained by said Ruth Jones, and in this regard I charge you that, in determining the actual pecuniary loss and injury sustained by her, you will take into consideration the age of said Ruth Jones, how long said Ruth Jones might reasonably be expected to live after the death of said B. B. Jones, the age of said B. B. Jones, his earnings at and prior to the time of his death, his habits as to thrift and economy, whether there would have been any likelihood or probability of said deceased acquiring property which would have descended to, or have been received by, said Ruth Jones, what contributions, if any, were made by said deceased, or would likely to have been made by said deceased had he continued to live, to, or for, said Ruth Jones, and you may take into consideration in determining said actual pecuniary injury and loss, the actual pecuniary value, if any, of the society, comfort, and companionship of said deceased to and with said Ruth Jones for the period of time that it reasonably might be expected to have continued, but that you shall not consider or place any value upon any grief, mental suffering, or sorrow sustained by her as a result of said death."

[20] Instruction numbered 14, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, B. B. Jones, in any manner contributed to the accident which resulted in his death, and for which this suit has been brought, then I charge you that you must find a verdict for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

This instruction is clearly not the law. It was properly refused. B. B. Jones, by his mere presence on or near the crossing, when struck by the train, of course, contributed to the accident which resulted in his death. In order to bar a recovery, the deceased must have negligently contributed to the happening of the accident. The instruction omits the element of negligent contribution. Rush v. Lagomarsino (Cal. Sup.) 237 P. 1066.

Instruction numbered 15, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"You are instructed that it appears from the evidence in this case that the deceased, B. B. Jones, was guilty of conduct amounting to negligence and lack of ordinary care, which conduct was a contributing and proximate cause of his death, and that therefore your verdict should be for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

[21] A mere inspection shows that this instruction directed the jury as to matters of fact, and therefore was properly refused. The giving of respondent's instruction numbered 29, which correctly stated the law, constituted no possible reason why the court should instruct the jury that the deceased was guilty of negligence.

Instruction numbered 16, requested by defendant and refused, is as follows:

"In another part of these instructions you are advised as to the law of this state regarding the duty of a railroad company to provide and sound bells or whistles when approaching a highway crossing, this instruction is to advise you that it is not necessary that both the whistle be sounded and the bell rung. If either the whistle is sounded or the bell rung, as required by law in approaching the crossing, the duty of the railroad company is performed."

[22, 23] It was properly refused because it does not correctly state the law applicable to the facts in this case. Under our view of section 486, Civil Code, the law requires the ringing of the bell within the corporate limits of a city, at a distance of at least 80 rods from the place where the railroad crosses any street, road, or highway, and to be kept ringing until it has crossed such street, road, or highway; there is no requirement that the whistle be sounded in cities, although of course there is no law forbidding that to be done. The subject was covered by other instructions given, to wit, 15 and 22, given at request of respondent.

"You are instructed that it was not the legal duty of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, at, or immediately before, the time of the accident sued for in this action, to have maintained any automatic, or other signal at, or near, the point of said accident, and you are instructed that you cannot find a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs, or either, or any, of them, because of such absence of any such automatic or other signal."

Instruction numbered 20 on the same subject, as to automatic signals, flagmen or watchmen, fully covered the subject-matter of 17; the giving of both instructions would have been useless repetition.

[25] Instruction numbered 18, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"You are instructed that there was no duty on the part of the engineer or fireman of the engine that struck B. B. Jones to stop said engine west of the crossing, unless they, or either of them, at a time when said engine could have been stopped west of the crossing, actually discovered said Jones in a place of danger and realized and believed that he either could not or would not extricate himself in time to prevent the accident, if the train continued at its then rate of speed."

As will be observed, this instruction is upon the subject of the law of the last clear chance, concededly not in this case; hence its refusal was not error.

Instruction numbered 19, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"I instruct you that, where the evidence is conflicting as to whether the whistle was blown or not and whether the bell was rung or not, and there is affirmative testimony that the whistle was blown and that the bell was rung, and negative testimony by other witnesses that they did not hear it, the affirmative evidence of the fact that the whistle was blown and that the bell was rung should overcome the negative evidence that the whistle was not blown and that the bell was not rung, and that testimony of the witnesses that they did not hear the whistle blown or the bell rung is not positive evidence that the whistle was not blown or that the bell was not rung."

[26] This instruction was upon the weight of evidence, which it was the sole province of the jury to determine. Its refusal was correct.

Instruction numbered 22, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"Crossing signals are not intended, or required, for the benefit of section men at work upon, or along, the track near a crossing, and the failure to give such signals is not negligence as to such section men thus engaged."

The authorities hereinbefore cited show that said instruction 22 does not embody the law of this case. Crossing signals under our law are intended for the benefit of anybody who may be on or approaching a crossing, and does not except or exclude persons rightfully at work upon or along or near a railroad crossing.

Instruction numbered 23, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"Railroad companies in the operation of their trains, may rightfully assume that section men, while at work upon, or along, the track, will look out for the approach and passage of trains at all times, and ordinarily such railroad companies owe to section men no duty to warn them of the approach of trains."

[27-29] This instruction, as shown in the foregoing opinion, upon the authority of the Egan Case, supra, and the Barboza Case, supra, does not embody the law of California. It assumes it to be the duty of any section man at all times to look out for the approach and passage of trains. The true rule is he must use reasonable, ordinary care to protect himself. It is manifest that, if he spent all his time, when he had work on a railroad track to perform, in looking out for the approach of trains, he could never do his work. The question whether or not he exercised reasonable and ordinary care and watchfulness was a question of fact for the jury to determine.

"A person working on, or along, a railroad track, where cars, or trains, are passing, or likely to pass at short intervals, while in a position to be endangered by such trains, must pay attention to his surroundings, and he must employ his natural faculties, and exert due diligence to avoid such dangers; he must look and listen to ascertain whether danger is threatened by his situation, and his failure to do so constitutes absolute negligence as a matter of law."

It was properly refused for the same reasons as was 23, and in addition it assumes the deceased knew trains were likely to pass at short intervals.

[31] Instruction numbered 25, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you believe, from a preponderance of the evidence in this case, that the deceased, B. B. Jones, had been warned by the foreman of the section men with whom he was working, to look out for the trains of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, and that his failure to heed such warning proximately contributed to his death, then your verdict should be for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

The foregoing instruction was properly refused, because it clearly implies, as a matter of fact, that Jones failed to heed the warning of the foreman, and that his failure contributed to his death. This subject has been sufficiently amplified hereinbefore.

Instruction numbered 26, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, B. B. Jones, was careless or negligent, and that his neglect contributed approximately to the accident resulting in his death, the plaintiff cannot recover, even though you should believe from the evidence, that the defendant Southern Pacific Company negligently omitted to give warning of the approach of its train by blowing the whistle or ringing the bell."

[32] This instruction was clearly erroneous because of the use of the word "approximately" instead of "proximately." It perhaps might easily have been amended, but the trial court no doubt felt that the instructions given covered the subject, and we agree in that view.

Instruction numbered 28, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"The railroad track of a steam railway must itself be regarded as a signal of danger, and one working upon or along said railroad track must avail himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains. If B. B. Jones, taking these precautions, would have seen or heard the approaching trains, the very fact of his injury and death will raise the presumption that he did not take the required precautions."

[33] Under the authorities and the law of California on the subject of workmen, the foregoing does not embody a correct statement of the law. If a workman on a railroad crossing avails himself of every opportunity to look and listen for approaching trains, he will be looking and listening all the time and not working at all. The refusal was not error.

[34] Instruction numbered 29, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If you should believe from a preponderance of the evidence that no whistle was sounded, and no bell was rung, on the train of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, these circumstances did not excuse the deceased, B. B. Jones, from looking and listening while working upon, or along, the railroad track of the defendant Southern Pacific Company. And, if you believe that the deceased, B. B. Jones, relied upon his belief that he did not hear any whistle or any bell, and therefore he did not remove from the place at which he was working on or along the railroad track of the defendant Southern Pacific Company and by reason thereof he was injured, which injuries resulted in his death, the plaintiffs cannot recover any damages, and your verdict must be for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

The foregoing clearly instructs upon the facts, and would have told the jury as a matter of fact that the deceased did not look and listen for trains at all, and was properly refused.

Instruction numbered 31, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"The failure of the engineer to sound the whistle or ring the bell, if you find from a preponderance of the evidence in this case that such was the fact, did not relieve said B. B. Jones from the necessity of taking ordinary precautions for his own safety. Negligence of the railroad employees in such particulars, if any you find, was no excuse for negligence on the part of said decedent. He was bound to exercise all of his senses and faculties to avoid being struck by any approaching train and not to remain carelessly in a place of danger."

[35] This instruction also invaded the domain of fact, and would have told the jury that the deceased, Jones, remained carelessly in the place of danger, and was guilty of negligence. It was properly refused.

Instruction numbered 32, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"Assuming that the duty of the defendant Southern Pacific Company was to anticipate that a person might be working upon, or along its railroad track, there was also a duty on the part of the deceased, B. B. Jones, to exercise reasonable and ordinary care while working upon or along the railroad track of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, and if you believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, B. B. Jones, if he had used his eyes and ears while working upon or along said track, and before he was struck by the engine or cars, could have observed the approach of the train on the track, and so have avoided the accident, his failure to exercise such care, and thus to make use of his eyes and ears, is contributory negligence, and in such event your verdict must be for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

[36] This was properly refused also because it invades the province of the jury by instructing, impliedly at least, upon matters of fact. It clearly implies that deceased did not use his eyes and ears while working, and that he failed to exercise care. It is hypothetically argumentative, and does not include all qualifying facts essential.

Instruction numbered 33, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"I instruct you that it is the duty of a person working on, or along, a railroad track, over, upon and along which locomotives and trains of cars frequently cross and pass over, to look and listen for coming trains. It is his duty to use all of his faculties, and it is not enough if he merely listens, believing that the people in charge of any approaching engine will ring a bell or sound a whistle."

[37] The foregoing also instructs on matters of fact because it contains the implication that Jones did not use all his faculties, but merely listened and did not look. It was properly refused.

[38] Instruction numbered 34, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"If, after having heard all of the evidence in this case, you should believe, from the evidence, that the deceased, B. B. Jones, was negligent, and that his negligence proximately contributed to his death, and you should also believe from a preponderance of the evidence in this case, that the defendant Southern Pacific Company was negligent, then I instruct you that in such an event your verdict must be for the defendant Southern Pacific Company."

The subject-matter of this instruction is fully covered by instruction numbered 35, requested by appellant and given. Its refusal, therefore, was not erroneous.

[39, 40] Instruction numbered 37, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"You have no right to, and cannot, disregard the testimony of the witnesses who were in charge of the train of the defendant Southern Pacific Company at the time of the accident, simply because they were, or now are, in the employ of the defendant Southern Pacific Company, and you cannot reject their testimony, or the testimony of either of them; neither can you view their testimony, nor the testimony of either of them, with suspicion, unless it has appeared to your satisfaction, from their manner of testifying, or by other satisfactory and sufficient evidence, that they have not testified truthfully."

This was properly refused, because the jury was fully instructed in other instructions upon the credibility of witnesses and neither party is entitled to have instructions as to the credibility of particular witnesses.

Instruction numbered A, requested by appellant and refused, is as follows:

"I instruct you that a railroad company is not required to blow the whistle on its engine while approaching crossings, or otherwise, within the corporate limits of a city, and, if you believe from the evidence in this case that the accident for which this suit has been brought occurred within the corporate limits of the city of Lodi, then I instruct you that there was no obligation or duty on the part of the defendant Southern Pacific Company to blow its whistle on said locomotive approaching the crossing where the accident occurred."

[41] The foregoing instruction contains a part only of the rule of section 486, Civil Code. The refusal to give the instruction was not prejudicial. It was not sufficiently qualified.

We may summarize our conclusions as follows: (1) The motion for nonsuit was properly denied. (2) Questions of appellant's negligence and of deceased's negligence and contributory negligence were questions for the jury and properly submitted to it. (3) The general verdict of the jury finds support in the evidence. (4) No error of law prejudicial to the rights of appellant occurred upon the trial. (5) The jury followed the instructions of the court as to the law; its findings upon the special issues also find support in the evidence and are in conformity with the instructions. (6) There is no necessary nor irreconcilable conflict between the general verdict and the answers to special issues numbered 11 and 12. (7) The court did not err in ordering the general verdict to be entered and recorded, nor in refusing to enter judgment in favor of defendant Southern Pacific Company. (8) The special findings are consistent with and not, as contended, irreconcilably inconsistent with or destructive of the general verdict. The sum of money allowed by the jury as damages was not excessive, nor given under the influence of passion or prejudice, but finds support in the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

74 Cal. App. 1

GREENE v. TOWN OF LAKEPORT.
(Civ. 2809.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 28, 1925.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸162(1)—Statutory provisions as to fees made part of ordinance.

Where board of trustees passed ordinance fixing as compensation for city treasurer "such fees as are provided for by law," and the only law which fixed fees of treasurer was Municipal Corporations Act 1883, § 876, held, reference to this law adopted provisions of statute and made them part of ordinance.

2. Statutes ⟸279—Not necessary to plead statute in complaint; being matter of judicial cognizance.

In action by city treasurer to recover fees under ordinance which adopted provision in Municipal Corporations Act 1883, § 876, held not necessary to plead statute in complaint, since it is a matter of judicial cognizance.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸162(1)—Board of trustees authorized to pass ordinance not in conflict with Constitution.

Board of trustees of city has plenary power to pass ordinance not in conflict with Constitution of state or United States and providing for the compensation of named officers during their several terms of office.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸116—Ordinance not affected by repeal of incorporated statute as to officer's fees.

Where ordinance provided that fees of treasurer should be as provided by law, the later repeal of statute pertaining to fees did not in any manner affect the ordinance, and after the repeal fees were paid in accordance with the ordinance alone.

5. Estoppel ⟸62(5)—Fact of former payment of official fees or salaries does not legalize unauthorized payments nor create estoppel.

The fact that trustees had paid to successive treasurers official fees or salaries would not legalize unauthorized payments or create an estoppel, as official compensation must be duly authorized by statute.

6. Municipal corporations ⟸162(1)—Legislature's intent to allow compensation of city treasurer to be in control of local boards.

Where Legislature in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 33, § 1), re-enacted Municipal Corporations Act 1883, § 876, with the provision for compensation of treasurers omitted, obvious intent was to allow the compensation of such officers to be in control of local board, since Municipal Corporations Act 1883, §§ 855 and 862, respecting pay of treasurers, were not amended.

7. Statutes ⟸181(1), 230—Main object of all statutory construction is to ascertain legislative will; amendments not construed as depriving adopting statute of all effect unless clearly necessary.

The main object of all statutory construction is to ascertain the legislative will, and it is to be assumed that Legislatures intend its facts to have effective operation, and amendments will not be construed as depriving adopting statute of all effect, unless there is clear necessity for such construction.

8. Municipal corporations ⟸105—Statutes ⟸51—May adopt part of one statute or ordinance in another.

In the adoption of one statute or ordinance, provisions of another statute or ordinance may be adopted by reference and become part of such adopting statute or ordinance.

9. Municipal corporations ⟸164—Trustees may not change salary after taking office.

In action by treasurer for fees, the fact that trustees by ordinance had, after his taking office, changed the salary, would not be a defense under Municipal Corporations Act 1883, § 855.

10. Pleading ⟸222—Cannot interpose answer after decision on demurrer on appeal.

Where defendant had demurred to complaint and refused to answer, a request for permission to answer after deciding demurrer on appeal was too late.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by D. W. Greene against the Town of Lakeport. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 227 P. 645.

W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for appellant.

C. M. Crawford and H. G. Crawford, both of Lakeport, for respondent.

McDANIEL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and respondent, upon the failure of the defendant to answer plaintiff's complaint within the time allowed by law, and extensions thereof granted by the court after defendant's demurrer to said complaint had been overruled. The action was brought by plaintiff to recover the sum of $957.38, alleged to be due him as and for his compensation as treasurer of the town of Lakeport, accruing between the 1st day of October, 1922, and the 1st day of October, 1923.

The material facts alleged in the complaint may be summarized as follows: That the town of Lakeport is, and at all times mentioned in the complaint has been, a municipal corporation of the sixth class, created under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. That on the 17th day of May, 1892, the board of trustees of said town duly adopted Ordinance No. 56, entitled, "An ordinance to fix the compensation of officers of the town of Lakeport, California," and section 3 of said ordinance reads as follows: "The treasurer, for performing the duties of his office, shall receive the fees provided by law for such service." That said quoted portion of said ordinance has never been modified, amended, or repealed since its adoption. That ever since said 17th day of May, 1892, the said town has duly and regularly paid its treasurer 1 per centum of all moneys received and paid out by him as such treasurer. That the plaintiff D. W. Greene was first elected treasurer of said town and qualified and entered upon the discharge of his duties as such treasurer in the month of April, 1916, and has ever since continued to be such treasurer, and has performed all the duties of such office according to law, having been elected biennially after such first election. That his last election was in April, 1920, when he was reelected for the term of 4 years, from which last-mentioned date up to the filing of the complaint he was and continued to be such treasurer. That part of his term he has been regularly paid the sum of 1 per cent. of all moneys received and paid out by him as said treasurer, as provided by law and the said ordinance, receiving his pay quarterly up to the 1st day of October, 1922, since which time, however, he has not been paid any compensation. That as such treasurer between the 1st day of October, 1922, and the 1st day of October, 1923, he received and paid out the sum of $95,738.91, upon which his compensation amounts to $957.38, no part of which has been paid, and it is now due, owing, and unpaid. That the board of trustees, upon the proper presentation of plaintiff's claim in due form, rejected, disallowed, and refused payment of it.

The demurrer was both general and special, the special grounds being as follows: That the complaint is ambiguous in this, (a) That it does not appear therefrom that the defendant, town of Lakeport, ever made any provisions for the compensation of the treasurer other than section 3 of Ordinance 56, as set forth and pleaded in paragraph 2 of said complaint, and there is no provision therein for the payment of 1 per cent. as compensation claimed by the plaintiff or any other compensation; (b) that it does not appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, upon what grounds the claim of compensation is based other than said Ordinance 56; (c) that it does not appear therefrom that there now is, or ever was, any fee provided by law for such services. For the same reasons it is alleged to be unintelligible and uncertain.

Appellant, in support of its claim that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, argues that the town of Lakeport is a creature of statutory law and subject thereto, and to all successive modifications and changes thereof; that there is no vested right in an officer to collect fees, but the Legislature has the legal right to change or abolish such fees at will; that there is no implied contract or contractual relationship between an officer and the people; that section 876 of the Municipal Corporations Act, as originally enacted, (St. 1883, p. 93), was the only authority for paying compensation to treasurers prior to 1913, and it was amended, in the year 1913 (St. 1913, p. 33, § 1), by re-enactment with the compensation clause omitted; that as thus amended it abolished all fees formerly provided in said section; that plaintiff, having taken office in the year 1916, 3 years subsequent to the said amendment of section 876, is not entitled to collect any compensation at all.

Appellant in argument cites many authorities. There appears, however, to be no controversy upon the most of the propositions of law discussed; the controversy herein depends more upon the proper application of the law to the admitted facts than upon its meaning or interpretation. It therefore will be unnecessary to comment at length upon those citations. However, with reference to the leading case which appellant contends "for all practical purposes to be on all fours with the issues in this case," to wit, Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 398, at pages 402, 403, we believe it either is not applicable at all to the admitted facts of this case (involving, as it does, the election laws), or it is in truth an authority against appellant's contention, when measured by the evident intent of the Legislature in the enactment of the several sections of the Municipal Corporations Act, which we shall proceed to examine.

The town of Lakeport was organized under the Municipal Corporations Act of 1883 (Stats. 1883, pp. 93 et seq.). Section 876 of the act, p. 275, is as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the treasurer to receive and safely keep all moneys which shall come into his hands as treasurer, for all of which he shall give duplicate receipts, one of which shall be filed with the clerk. He shall pay out said money on warrants signed by the president and countersigned by the clerk, and not otherwise. He shall make quarterly settlements with the clerk. For his compensation he shall be allowed one per cent. on all moneys received and paid by him as such treasurer. He may credit himself with such per cent. in his settlement with the clerk. Upon each quarterly settlement he shall file a statement of his account with the clerk."

Section 862, page 269, is as follows:

"The board of trustees of said city shall have power: first, to pass ordinances not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of this state or of the United States."

Section 855, p. 268, is as follows:

"The members of the board of trustees shall receive no compensation whatever. The clerk, treasurer, marshal and recorder shall severally receive, at stated times, a compensation, to be fixed by odinance by the board of trustees, which compensation shall not be increased or diminished after their election, or during their several terms of office. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the board of trustees from fixing such several amounts of compensation in the first instance, during the term of office of any such officer, or after his election. The compensation of all other officers shall be fixed from time to time by the boards of trustees."

[1, 2] We find no ambiguity, uncertainty, nor unintelligibility in the averments of the complaint. Respondent, in precise and appropriate language, bases his cause of action upon Ordinance No. 56, which by reference fixes as the compensation of the treasurer "such fees as are provided by law." At that time the only law in existence which fixed the fees of the treasurer was section 876, supra. The reference to this law thus definitely and explicitly made is, under well-settled rules of statutory construction, applicable as well to municipal ordinances as to acts of the Legislature, and adopted the provisions of the statute and made them a part of the ordinance, with exactly the same effect as if they had been set out in the ordinance in the very words and figures of the adopted law. Being a matter of judicial cognizance, it was not necessary to plead the law in the complaint.

[3] As shown by sections 862 and 855, the board of trustees of said city has plenary power to pass ordinances not in conflict with the Constitution of this state or the United States, and to fix the compensation of the named officers, and to provide that their compensation shall not be increased nor diminished during their several terms of office.

Section 881 of the same act (page 278, Statutes of 1883) permits the board of trustees by ordinance to prescribe additional duties for all officers and fix their compensation. We deem this section not involved in this proceeding.

It is apparent, upon examination of the several sections above quoted, that, as the law stood in 1892, there was presented a statutory situation, from which, in the event of the passage of any ordinance pursuant to section 855, different in terms as to compensation from those named in section 876, litigable questions might arise, based upon the fact that the act sets out two methods by which to compensate treasurers for official service.

Was there any real conflict between these two methods? Or was it the intention of the Legislature to allow treasurers to receive and retain both kinds of compensation; that is, compensation under ordinance and also fees provided by section 876?

It properly may be inferred, in the light of later changes, the Legislature considered those questions and found that in some municipalities of the sixth class ordinances had been adopted permitting respective treasurers to obtain compensation when they at the same time and for the same services were receiving and retaining fees specified in section 876; hence, in 1903 (Stats. 1903, p. 336) section 876 was amended as to the treasurer to read as follows:

"When no compensation has been allowed to him by the board of trustees, he shall be allowed one per cent., * * *" etc.

The intent in amending that section was to cut off its allowance, when other compensation had been allowed by the trustees. The amendment did not affect any existing ordinance adopted pursuant to section 855.

In 1892 and thereafter until 1913, if Ordinance No. 56 had not been enacted, section 876 alone would have provided for the treasurer's compensation; but it is also true that, if said section 876 had not then existed, the board of trustees had plenary power, under sections 862 and 855, to adopt an ordinance fixing compensation in the exact language of section 876.

As sections 855 and 876 both related to compensation for treasurers, the board of trustees passed Ordinance 56 in its existing form, thereby avoiding any and all conflict which perhaps would have existed with a different measure of compensation. It thus reconciled the two sections, which thereafter were concurrently operative until 1913.

[4] Unquestionably, under the facts stated in the complaint, the compensation of the treasurer of Lakeport, after the amendment of 1913, was paid in accordance with Ordinance No. 56 alone. This was done without violating any law or being in conflict with the Constitution of this state or of the United States. The repeal in 1913 of the part of section 876 pertaining to fees did not in any manner or at all affect Ordinance No. 56 nor section 855. In as far as treasurers are concerned, section 855 has never been amended nor repealed.

[5] We agree with appellant that no question of equitable estoppel is in this case. The fact that the trustees have paid to successive treasurers official fees or salaries would not legalize unauthorized payments, nor create an estoppel against appellant. Official compensation, whether fees or salary, must be duly authorized by statute. In this case, as indicated, we think such statutory authority existed in said Ordinance No. 56.

[6, 7] In the year 1913 the Legislature discovered that, following the amendment of 1903, the provision in section 876 for the compensation of treasurers had become superfluous and might well be eliminated; therefore it re-enacted said section with that provision omitted. Appellant argues that this amendment repealed all laws for the payment of compensation of treasurers in municipalities of the sixth class, but the argument is not sound, because sections 855 and 862, with respect to the pay of treasurers, were not amended nor in any wise affected. The obvious intent was to allow the compensation of such officials to be altogether in the control of the local boards of trustees. The amendments were wise because they did away with uncertainty, confusion, and vexatious opportunities for litigation, eliminated the dual method where one would suffice, and avoided the possibility of double compensation for single service.

"The main object of all statutory construction is to ascertain the legislative will, and, as it is to be assumed that the Legislature intends its acts to have effective operation, such amendments will not be construed as depriving the adopting statute of all effect, unless there is a clear necessity for such construction." Ramish v. Hartwell, 126 Cal. 443, 58 P. 920; Cuthbert v. Woodman, 185 Cal. 43, 195 P. 673.

It was never the intent of the Legislature to abolish the compensation of the treasurer. De Merritt v. Weldon, 154 Cal. 545, 98 P. 537, 671, 16 Ann. Cas. 955.

[8] The principle is well settled that in the adoption of one statute or ordinance the provisions of another statute or ordinance may be adopted by reference and become a part of such adopting statute or ordinance. Don v. Pfister, 172 Cal. 25, 155 P. 60; People v. Whipple No. 2, 47 Cal. 592; Ramish v. Hartwell, supra; Kendall v. U. S., 12 Pet. 524, 9 L. Ed. 1181; Ex parte Humphrey, 64 Cal. App. 572, 222 P. 366; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 88 P. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911; Buck v. Eureka, 109 Cal. 504, 42 P. 243, 30 L. R. A. 409; Cavanagh v. Shaver, 56 Cal. App. 758, 207 P. 275.

The fallacy of appellant's whole argument lies in its erroneous hypothesis that the treasurers of Lakeport at all times since 1892 have received official compensation pursuant to section 876 until the year of 1913, and thereafter without any authority of law; whereas, in fact, they have received compensation pursuant to the real provisions of Ordinance 56. That ordinance, having been in effect during all of respondent's incumbency, has been the source of his right to payment for his official work. It therefore is certain that the trial court's order overruling the demurrer was correct and should be sustained.

[9, 10] Counsel for appellant suggests, if we do not entertain the same views as appellant, that it be given permission to file an answer to the complaint so that certain questions of fact may be put in issue and adjudicated. It is also stated that in the month of April, 1923, the trustees of Lakeport, by Ordinance No. 183, amended said section 3 of said Ordinance No. 56 to read as follows:

"The treasurer, for performing the duties of his office, shall receive as salary the sum of $120 per annum."

If that be one of the matters of fact appellant wishes to present in an answer, we cannot see that it could be of any avail, if pleaded herein, for section 855, supra, does not permit the treasurer's compensation to be increased or diminished after his election or during his term of office. We cannot adopt the suggestion of appellant. It had opportunity to answer and refused to do so. To have preserved all its rights and presented all the objections urged upon this appeal, it readily might have had a bill of exceptions settled and allowed reserving those matters and then have answered. It did not choose to follow that course, and the request now for permission to answer is too late and is denied.

We see no reason why the judgment should be disturbed, and it therefore is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

PEOPLE v. SNYDER. (Cr. 1237.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 10, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 8, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⟸984—Indictment and information ⟸129(2)—Defendant may be convicted of both offenses, separately or jointly charged in different counts of same indictment.

Burglary and larceny are distinct offenses, which may be charged separately under Pen. Code, § 954, or jointly in different counts of same indictment, and defendant may be convicted of and punished for both offenses, though both grew out of same transaction.

2. Criminal law ⟸508(1)—Voluntary testimony for state by accomplice or codefendant held not prohibited by statute.

Pen. Code, § 1099, merely permits dismissal of criminal action against any one of two or more defendants, jointly charged with same crime, so that he may be compelled to testify, as shown by section 1101, declaring such dismissal an acquittal of such defendant, and does not prevent accomplice or codefendant from testifying voluntarily for state, where his evidence is not a declaration or confession.

3. Criminal law ⟸511(7)—Accomplice's testimony, defendant's admissions and confessions, and other proof held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Accomplice's testimony, corroborated by defendant's admissions and confessions, together with proof that storeroom was entered and money stolen therefrom, held to justify conviction of first degree burglary and larceny, though another accomplice testified that defendant was not present at time.

4. Criminal law ⊜824(5)—Defendant cannot complain of failure to give instruction not requested by him.

In absence of request for instruction that jury must believe confession was voluntarily made before they could consider it, defendant cannot complain of failure to so instruct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Arthur Snyder was convicted of grand larceny and burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

John F. Groene, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CURTIS, J. The defendant was accused by information containing two counts. By the first count he was charged with grand larceny in the stealing of the sum of $800 on December 7, 1924, belonging to Arthur H. Wilkie, and by the second count with the crime of burglary in entering the store of said Arthur H. Wilkie on the same date with the intent to commit larceny. It is conceded that the evidence shows that both crimes grew out of and were the result of the same transaction. In other words, that the $800, alleged in count 1 to have been stolen by defendant, was taken from the store of the complaining witness after and on the occasion of the entry of said storeroom by defendant with intent to commit larceny. The jury found defendant guilty of each offense by verdicts rendered separately upon each count of the information, and the court pronounced judgment upon such verdicts, the sentence to run consecutively.

[1] It is first contended by appellant that the two offenses charged, being based upon one single act or transaction, constitute only one offense, and although, under section 954 of the Penal Code, the two offenses might be charged in separate counts in the information, the defendant could be found guilty of and punished for but one offense. This question seems to have been definitely settled by the Supreme Court of this state adversely to appellant's contention. In People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622, 628, the court held that:

"Larceny is not necessarily included in burglary, like manslaughter in murder, within the sense of the statute; on the contrary, it is no part of it. The offense of burglary is complete without any larceny being committed."

This case was approved in People v. Curtis, 76 Cal. 57, 17 P. 941, the court holding that the offense of larceny was not included in that of burglary, and that a defendant prosecuted under indictment charging him with burglary could not be found guilty of an attempt to commit larceny. In People v. Devlin, 143 Cal. 128, 76 P. 900, the defendant was charged with burglary. Upon the trial he sought to prove, as a bar to said charge of burglary, that he had, prior thereto, been convicted of the crime of larceny for stealing and carrying away certain personal property on the same occasion. The trial court sustained an objection to the introduction of this evidence, and the Supreme Court, in sustaining this action of the trial court, said:

"It is evident that one can commit burglary by entering a building with intent to commit any felony, such as rape, robbery, arson, or murder. It is also evident that the crime consists of the entry with the intent set forth in the statute. After one has entered a building with intent to commit any other felony than grand or petit larceny, he has committed burglary, but he may then find that it is impossible, for various reasons, to commit the felony which it was his intention to commit when he entered, and conclude to commit larceny by stealing some article of value in the building. He thus, in rapid succession, commits two crimes. Indeed, after he has committed burglary he might under favorable circumstances commit any felony named in the statute. He might commit rape, and in such case he would be guilty of burglary and also of rape. Therefore, we conclude that the evidence did not show, nor tend to show, that defendant had been before in jeopardy for burglary."

This case was cited with approval in People v. Kerrick, 144 Cal. 46, 77 P. 711. The weight of authority in other jurisdictions agrees with the above cases decided by our Supreme Court. "Burglary and larceny * * * are distinct offenses [and] a conviction of one is not a bar to a prosecution for the other." State v. Martin, 76 Mo. 337. "If a man feloniously enter a house * * * with intent to steal, he is guilty of burglary, though he may not accomplish the theft. If he completes the theft, he is guilty of a further offense, and may, by statute, be indicted and punished for both burglary and larceny; and he may be charged with the two offenses separately, or jointly in different counts of the same indictment." Dodd v. State, 33 Ark. 517. For further authorities upon this same subject, see note found in 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 727. There are jurisdictions in which a contrary doctrine is held, but we are satisfied that the great weight of authority is with the rule enunciated by our own courts.

[2] The claim of appellant that the court improperly admitted the evidence of Charles Saxton, who was charged jointly with appellant, and against whom said charge was then pending, cannot be sustained. Appellant contends that an accomplice charged jointly with the defendant cannot be a witness against said defendant until he has been discharged, and cites section 1099 of the Penal Code in support of this contention.

Appellant has apparently misapprehended the meaning and purpose of this section of the Code. Its sole purpose is to permit a dismissal of a criminal action, wherein two or more defendants are jointly charged with the same crime, against any one of the said defendants in order that the defendant so discharged may be compelled to become a witness in the action. This purpose is made clear by section 1101, which declares that the dismissal so made "is an acquittal of the defendant discharged." Section 1099 has no reference to an accomplice or to a codefendant who voluntarily becomes a witness on behalf of the people. In the present action there is no intimation that the accomplice Saxton, who testified in behalf of the prosecution, made any objection to becoming a witness in the case. Having voluntarily testified, his evidence was admissible against the appellant and competent to prove any fact testified to by him, subject only to the limitations applicable to testimony given by an accomplice. Our attention has been directed by appellant's brief, in support of this last contention to a number of authorities holding that declarations or confessions of an accomplice, made after the completion of the offense, are not admissible against the other persons charged with said offense jointly with said accomplice. The cases cited by appellant correctly state the law upon the subject therein under discussion, but they have no application to the question under consideration in this action. No declaration or confession of an accomplice was admitted in evidence in this case, but, on the other hand, the evidence of one who was undoubtedly an accomplice was given at the trial against the defendant. This evidence, as we have already stated, was unquestionably admissible against the appellant. It was in no sense a declaration or confession of the party giving it, as these terms are understood in law.

[3] This testimony of the accomplice, having being corroborated by the admissions and confessions of the appellant, taken in connection with proof that the storeroom had been entered and the money stolen therefrom, justified the verdict, and was sufficient to sustain the judgment. It is true that another accomplice, named McLaughlin, testified that appellant was not present at the time the house was entered and the money stolen, but this statement on his part simply produced a conflict between his evidence and that of the witness Saxton, and the jury apparently accepted the statement of the latter, who testified to appellant's direct participation in the crime.

[4] Appellant questions the sufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict finding him guilty of burglary in the first degree. The accomplice, Saxton, testified that the storeroom, which the defendant with his associates was charged with burglarizing, had been entered during the nighttime. There was also admitted in evidence the confession of the appellant that on the evening of November 6th, he, with his codefendants, had gone to Newhall and burglarized the store and returned to Los Angeles with the merchandise. It has repeatedly been held that the testimony of an accomplice is sufficient to prove the corpus delicti, and, when corroborated by the admission or confession of the defendant, warrants a verdict of conviction. People v. Richardson, 161 Cal. 552, 563, 120 P. 20; People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 178, 184, 106 P. 1103; People v. Barnnovich, 16 Cal. App. 427, 430, 117 P. 572; People v. Tobin, 39 Cal. App. 76, 179 P. 443. Regarding the confession of appellant, he complains that the court failed to instruct the jury that before they could consider any confession as evidence, they must believe that such confession was voluntarily made. No request for any such instruction was made by appellant. He therefore cannot complain of any omission to instruct the jury in this regard.

We discover no error in the rulings of the court in refusing to give two instructions requested by appellant: One in reference to the possession of stolen property, and the other dealing with the fact that appellant was found in the presence of one of his codefendants.

Judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

1. Criminal law ⟸258(4)—Justice's court has power to amend its records to make them speak truth with respect to judgment actually pronounced.

The justice's court has power to amend its records so as to make them speak the truth with respect to judgment which it has actually pronounced.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸30(3)—Petitioner's contention that judgment was void held unsubstantial and relating to form merely.

In application for habeas corpus, petitioner's contention that judgment was void in that it unqualifiedly provided for imprisonment in default of payment of fine on conviction for selling intoxicating liquors, held unsubstantial and relating to form merely, inasmuch as it was shown justice's court pronounced judgment in proper form, but that justice made only a synoptical entry thereof in his docket which was corrected by justice on petition for habeas corpus.

Application by Luke M. Glavich for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the Sheriff of Amador County, to secure release from commitment following conviction for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. Petitioner remanded.

See, also, 239 P. 708.

Clifford A. Russell, of Sacramento, and A. L. Pierovich and C. W. Kelly, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Wm. G. Snyder, of Jackson, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Upon the application of petitioner, a writ of habeas corpus was issued herein, and the petitioner was admitted to bail pending the determination of the proceeding.

Petitioner alleges that he was convicted in the justice's court of the offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor; that on the 21st day of May, 1925, judgment was entered against him as follows: "It is ordered and adjudged that the defendant, Luke M. Glavich, pay a fine of $500 or be imprisoned in the county jail 500 days;" that petitioner is illegally imprisoned in the county jail under a commitment based upon such judgment. The contention is that the judgment is void in so far as it provides for imprisonment in default of payment of the fine. Petitioner relies upon the case of Ex parte Baldwin, 60 Cal. 432, holding that a judgment couched in similar language was void as to the provision therein for imprisonment. In Ex parte Riley, 142 Cal. 124, 75 P. 665, however, a judgment in essentially the same form as that in the Baldwin Case was upheld.

The sheriff's return shows that he holds petitioner under a certified copy of a judgment pronounced on the 21st day of May, 1925. The judgment as so certified directs that the defendant be imprisoned "until the fine be duly satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine; and on the payment of such portion of such fine as shall not have been satisfied by imprisonment, at the rate above specified, that you be discharged from custody." It is not contended that the judgment set out in the return is defective in any particular.

[1, 2] At the hearing herein it was shown that the justice's court pronounced judgment in the form stated in the return, signed a written memorandum thereof in the same form and filed it with the papers in the action, but that the justice of the peace made only a "synoptical entry of said judgment in his docket" in the form alleged in the petition herein. After petitioner made this application for a writ of habeas corpus, the justice's court corrected the entry of the judgment by setting it forth in full as it appears in the sheriff's return. The justice's court has power to amend its records so as to make them speak the truth with respect to a judgment which it has actually pronounced. Wildenhayn v. Justice's Court, 34 Cal. App. 306, 167 P. 305.

The contentions of petitioner are unsubstantial and relate to form only.

Ex parte GLAVICH. (Cr. 2825.)

1. Fines ⟸12—Though only fine and not imprisonment may be imposed for first offense of possession of intoxicating liquor, court may order imprisonment in satisfaction of fine.

Although, under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 29 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p), by adoption constituting part of Wright Act, only penalty that can be imposed on first offender for possession of intoxicating liquors is fine of not more than $500 and no sentence to imprisonment can be imposed, nevertheless under Pen. Code, § 1446, court may direct that defendant be imprisoned until fine be satisfied in proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of fine.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸22(1)—Petitioner held not entitled to release from imprisonment in view of failure to show offense was first offense, and of court's power to order imprisonment in satisfaction of fine.

Where petitioner was committed on judgment for possessing intoxicating liquors, requiring "that petitioner pay fine of $500 or be imprisoned in county jail 500 days," which was void under Volstead Act, tit. 2, § 29 (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p) by adoption constituting part of Wright Act, held, petitioner was not entitled to release, in view of failure to show offense was first offense, and in view of court's power to imprison in satisfaction of fine.

In Bank.

Application for a writ of habeas corpus by Luke M. Glavich, to be directed to the Sheriff of Amador County, to secure release of petitioner convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. Writ denied.

See, also, 239 P. 707.

Andrew L. Pierovich and Cornelius W. Kelly, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. [1] Application for a writ of habeas corpus. The petitioner was convicted in the justice's court of a violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) in that he unlawfully had in his possession certain intoxicating liquors containing more than the legal alcoholic content. The judgment and sentence of the court was that petitioner

"pay a fine of $500.00 or be imprisoned in the county jail five hundred days." He is now in custody under the commitment issued on the judgment. The point of his application for release on a writ of habeas corpus is, that under section 29 of title 2 of the Volstead Act (U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1923, § 10138½p), which by adoption is now a part of the Wright Act, the only penalty that can be imposed for a first offense is a fine of not more than $500. There can be no sentence to imprisonment. The point is well taken (Ex parte Adams, 61 Cal. App. 239, 214 P. 467), but it does not follow that petitioner is entitled to be released from imprisonment on this application.

[2] In the first place, it is not alleged, and is nowhere made to appear, that petitioner's conviction was for a first offense. In the second place, and assuming that the conviction was for a first offense, the court had jurisdiction to impose a fine not exceeding $500, and, in addition to imposing the fine, might have directed that the defendant be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the amount. Pen. Code, § 1446. Such may have been the intention of the court in this case, but in imposing an unqualified sentence for a definite term of imprisonment it exceeded its power. When petitioner has paid the fine imposed upon him, if he be thereafter held in custody, he will be in a position to seek his release.

The petition is denied without prejudice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Galipsa Hatzakorzian, as administratrix of the estate of H. Hatzakorzian, deceased, against the Rucker-Fuller Desk Company and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Transferred from District Court of Appeal. Reversed.

Geo. Ohannesian, of Fresno, for appellant.

Frederick W. Docker, of Fresno, and Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley, of San Francisco (Bradley & Supple, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. This cause was ordered to be transferred to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal, Third District, for the reason that it was deemed advisable to give further study to the questions involved herein, and particularly to the issues of negligence on the part of the defendants and the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff's intestate.

After further consideration, we are in accord with the views expressed by Mr. Justice Hart in the opinion written by him for the District Court of Appeal. It is as follows:

"This is an action for damages for wrongfully causing the death of plaintiff's intestate. The case was tried by the court, without the aid of a jury, and findings and judgment were in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

"The complaint alleges that, on the 3d day of September, 1921, the deceased, while walking in a northerly direction 'upon the extreme right-hand side of a public highway running between the town of Easton and the city of Fresno, in the county of Fresno, * * *' and not far distant from the town of Easton, was run into from the rear and fatally injured by an automobile driven by the defendant Kennell; that said Kennell was then and there the employee, servant, and agent of the defendant corporation; that said Kennell, immediately before and at the time the said automobile collided with deceased, was driving and operating said machine in a careless and negligent manner, and that by reason of such careless and negligent driving the collision occurred, and that as a result thereof bodily injuries were inflicted upon deceased from the effect of which he died. The complaint further states that the deceased left surviving him his wife, the plaintiff herein, and five minor children, all entirely dependent upon him and during the lifetime of the deceased receiving from him care, nurture, maintenance, support, etc.

"The defendants, jointly answering the complaint, denied the allegations thereof, and alleged affirmatively that the accident and the consequent death of the deceased were wholly caused by the deceased's own negligence. At the time of the trial, however, the defendants, by leave of the court, amended their answer by pleading the defense of contributory negligence, alleging that the injuries sustained by the deceased, and resulting in his death, were contributed to by his own negligence.

"The court found that, on the night of the 3d of September, 1921, the deceased was walking in a northerly direction on the right-hand side of the public highway above referred to; that 'it is true that said H. Hatzakorzian was carelessly, recklessly, and negligently walking on said public highway in the nighttime and in the darkness of the night directly in the path of traffic moving on said highway in the same direction in which the said Hatzakorzian was walking with his back to the direction of traffic on said highway without giving or paying any attention to the traffic on said highway or taking any care or precaution for his safety in the position in which he had placed himself; that said H. Hatzakorzian was familiar with and knew the use of said highway and the danger to which he negligently and carelessly exposed himself'; that the automobile which collided with and struck deceased, inflicting injuries which resulted in the latter's death, was driven and operated at the time by the defendant Kennell, but that at said time said Kennell was not driving said car in a careless and negligent manner; that the injuries to and the death of deceased by reason of the collision were not caused by 'any wrongful, careless, or negligent acts of the defendants or either of them'; that the injuries and the consequent death of the deceased were solely and proximately due to and caused by the latter's own carelessness and negligence, and 'without any fault on the part of the defendants, or either of them.'

"There are several assignments of error, but the point particularly stressed by the plaintiff is that the evidence does not support the findings, or, in other words, that the evidence indisputably shows that the accident and resultant death of the plaintiff's intestate were directly caused by the negligence of the defendants. This contention will necessitate, of course, an extended examination of the evidence.

"The highway upon which the accident occurred is known as Elm avenue and runs practically in a straight line north and south. The paved portion of the highway was at the time of the accident 16 feet in width. It was made of gravel, asphalt, and sand, and is what is known as 'black base.' The shoulders of the highway on both sides thereof, which are made of dirt common to the locality in which the highway is situated, are approximately 10 feet in width on the one side and likewise 9 feet on the other and have a gradual slope toward the fence or pits on either side. For 7 feet, approximately, the slope from the paved portion is practically level, and at the end of the 7 feet it breaks sharply.

"The defendant Kennell and a young man named Suran Ohannesian were the only persons present at the scene of the accident when it occurred, and consequently theirs was the only testimony presented at the trial that reflected any light on the circumstances under which the collision was brought about.

"Suran Ohannesian, to whom we will hereinafter refer as Suran, was the companion of, and, at the time of the collision, was walking along the highway with, the deceased, the former walking about 20 feet ahead of the latter.

"The deceased who, at the time of his death, was 39 years of age, was a farmer and owned and operated a farm some 12 miles south of the city of Fresno. To reach his farm from Fresno, it was necessary to pass through or near the town of Easton.

"The story told by Suran of the misadventure may thus be summarized: On the 3d day of September, 1921, near the hour of 8:30 p. m., the deceased, accompanied by Suran, the latter's mother, sister and brother-in-law, left the city of Fresno in an Overland automobile together via Elm avenue for the ranch of the deceased. On reaching a point about a mile north of Easton some part of the machinery of the car in which they were riding got out of order, with the result that the machine stalled. After repeated unavailing attempts to start the car, the deceased, assisted by others of his party, moved it from the paved to the unpaved portion of the highway on the west side thereof. Suran and the deceased then started for Easton to telephone a friend in Fresno and request him to go to where their car was and tow it to the former place. They were conveyed to Easton by a passing autoist, going in the direction of that town. Arriving at Easton, deceased telephoned his friend at Fresno and immediately thereafter he and Suran started on their return to the point at which they had left the car. It was at this time near the hour of 9 o'clock, the night was very dark, and there were no lights on the highway. They were walking in a northerly direction and on the right-hand side of the highway, Suran walking and keeping ahead of deceased a distance of about 20 feet. Suran testified that as they were walking along they carried on a conversation, the deceased frequently making some jocular remark about the situation they were in because of the stalling of their machine, and that both would laugh at the remark. A number of cars passed them, going in the same direction, 'and,' Suran proceeded, 'I asked for a ride from the cars that went north to get to the car quicker and they wouldn't stop. * * * And I would keep off the highway and I would always look back and see if there was a car coming to ask for a ride, * * * and I would see Mr. Hatzakorzian off the paved highway, too. When we were about a half a mile north (of Easton) I heard a crash and looked back. Suddenly I was thrown back and fell about 10 feet and there was a hole there that I fell in and I had a hurt on my knee, and when I stood up I couldn't stand. I sat down and I saw the car that had hit us still keeping on and I hollered to him to stop, that he had hurt somebody, but he wouldn't stop and kept on going. I noticed another car come back and stop near us and I saw that Mr. Hatzakorzian's body was laying about three or four feet in front of me, and it was all crushed up and blood was covered,' meaning, as may be assumed, that the deceased was covered with blood. The 'other car,' which Suran said, 'come back and stopped near us,' turned out to be the car of Kennell, who, after striking the deceased and Suran, proceeded a short distance up the road and then turned and returned to the spot where the accident occurred. Suran stated that, just as Kennell's car passed him going north, he (Suran) noticed that the tail light on the former's car was not on, and that he observed, when Kennell returned to the place of the accident, the front lights of his car were not on. Before reaching the spot where the mutilated body of Hatzakorzian lay upon the highway (said Suran) Kennell stopped his car, got out and attempted 'to fix the fender which was bended on the wheel. He fixed it,' continued the witness, 'and he got inside, lit the lights, turned around, and came to where we were.' On cross-examination, Suran repeated that, while they were walking along the highway, as above described, he frequently looked back to see if any cars were coming, that he thought he looked back every few seconds, and when he saw a car 'coming' he would keep his eyes on it; that the last time he looked back, which was just before deceased was struck down, he saw no car back of them or traveling in the direction in which they were going; that he did not see the car strike deceased; that he could not say whether or not the deceased looked back and saw the car of Kennell approaching him from the rear; that when he (witness) was struck he was two or three feet off the paved part of the highway and on the dirt portion thereof; that when he got on the highway, after having been struck, he saw the body of the deceased near the center of the highway. Suran further testified (on redirect) that, prior to the accident, he had had a year's experience in the driving of automobiles and that from such experience he was able to give it as his opinion that Kennell, when he struck witness, was driving at the rate of between 30 and 35 miles an hour.

"Defendant Kennell left the city of Fresno at or near the hour of 3 p. m. of the day of the accident for Easton, going by way of Elm avenue, over which he had previously never traveled. The object of his visit to Easton was to negotiate the sale of chairs for the high school at that town, and for that purpose he went out to interview the principal of said school. The latter resided about two miles west of Easton. Kennell arrived at the residence of the principal about 8 p. m., and after attending to the business for which he went there, and near the hour of 9 o'clock p. m., started on his return to Fresno. After reaching Elm avenue, he turned his car to the north, traveling about 100 feet with his car in second gear and then put it in 'first high' and so operated the car until the collision occurred. He testified that he had had three years' experience in operating automobiles; that, as the night was very dark and he had never passed over Elm avenue before, he 'was driving slowly, at a fair rate of speed, between 25 and 30 miles, when a machine with glaring lights, was coming towards me, and I slowed down somewhat until I passed it, but just as I passed the machine I struck the deceased and swerved to the left of the road and also felt another obstacle, which, I presume, was the young man who testified. Then I stopped and looked back, but it was so dark—I was afraid to back up, I didn't know just where the bodies might be—that is, if they had fallen down or whether they were able to get up or not; so I kept going until I came to a place where I could turn around, which was a gate, I presume 200 feet down from where the accident occurred.' Kennell found on attempting to turn his car, that the right fender thereof was twisted and bent over the right front wheel, so that he could not make the turn. He thereupon alighted, and straightened the fender so that he could turn the car. Returning to the spot where the collision occurred, he found that Hatzakorzian had been killed and Suran slightly injured. He placed the body of the deceased in his car, and accompanied by Suran, went to the city of Fresno, taking the dead body to the morgue and Suran to the Emergency Hospital. Kennell further testified that from the time he entered the highway from the road leading from the residence of the principal of the school to the time of the collision his lights, which, he stated, were readjusted a few days before the accident, were on, and that he did not, at any time, after entering the highway, leave the paved portion thereof; that the deceased was struck by the right-hand side of the machine; that when he struck Suran the right-hand side of his car was 'about a quarter of the way on the highway—that would be about four feet.'

"Kennell, with a deputy sheriff and a deputy coroner, returned to the scene of the accident shortly after he delivered the body of the deceased at the morgue, and by the aid of spotlights the portion of the highway where the collision took place was inspected. He said he did not see treadmarks of the wheels of a car anywhere thereabouts on the unpaved portion of the highway, nor blood on that portion thereof.

"On cross-examination, Kennell said that, when returning to Fresno on the highway, he had 'ample light to drive by'; that an object in front of him would be visible from his car at a distance or 75 or 100 yards. 'To see the road clearly, that is, extremely clearly,' he said, he could see an object before him a distance, 'maybe 150 to 200 feet.'

" 'Q. So that the light you had that evening lighted up the roadway so that you saw a distance between 150 and 200 feet, is that right? A. Yes, sir.

" 'Q. And you were able to discern any obstacles that might come in your way by reason of the light you have? A. Yes.'

"He stated that in going towards the highway from the home of the school principal his rate of speed was about 15 miles an hour; that on entering the highway and after going a few feet he increased his speed to about 25 miles an hour.

" 'Q. You are quite sure not more than that? A. Quite sure.

" 'Q. When did you first notice the glaring lights you spoke of on the approaching car? A. I would say that began to obscure my vision—that is, where I could not see the road clearly in front of me, possibly, on, maybe, 100 or 200 feet—I couldn't say for certain—before the accident occurred.

" 'Q. So that, for the space of 150 or 200 feet, you couldn't see the road clearly? A. I could see the road clearly.

" 'Q. But could you discern any objects on the highway? A. I could discern any kind of a light—you can always see a light through the glare, where you cannot see anything, practically, the color of the highway itself.

" 'Q. Anything but a light you couldn't see because of the glare you speak of? A. If approximately the same color as the highway.

" 'Q. That evening you didn't see anything? A. I didn't see anything, no.

" 'Q. That was due to the glaring lights? A. Yes, sir.

" 'Q. As soon as you noticed that the lights were before you so that you could not travel, what did you do, if anything? A. Slowed down somewhat. I might explain there, when I said 20 or 25 miles an hour, I felt possibly I was driving about 25, by taking my foot off of the accelerator, the momentum of the car carried me along till up to the point about 20 miles an hour, so when the accident occurred, I feel that I was going between 20 and 25.

" 'Q. Just before the glare of the lights, you were traveling 25 miles an hour? A. I would say approximately that.

" 'Q. Probably a little more than that. A. I don't think so.

" 'Q. But what precautions did you take when you first saw the glare of the light, what did you do, anything at all, or merely allowed the car to run—what did you do, if anything, when you saw the glare of this light? A. I slowed down somewhat. As far as taking precaution and anticipating something being there, I didn't anticipate it. * * *

" 'Q. Did you put your brake on when you saw this glare was interfering with your sight? A. No, sir.

" 'Q. Did you turn your gas off? A. I took my foot off the accelerator.

" 'Q. Did you turn off the ignition? A. No, sir.

" 'Q. You merely allowed the car to run at the rate of speed it was going, carried by its momentum, is that it? A. Yes, sir.

" 'Q. How far had you traveled in that condition, with the lights glaring on your windshield before you struck the first obstacle? A. The light was glaring in my eyes and not the windshield.

" 'Q. Through the windshield? A. Through the windshield, yes.

" 'Q. And how far had you traveled in that condition before you struck the first obstacle? A. I would say anywhere from 100 to 200 feet.

" 'Q. And from the point that you started and to the time you struck during that space you were unable to see any obstacle on the road because of this glare through the windshield upon your eyes? A. I could have seen, I believe, anything a short distance from the machine up to the time when I got practically next to the machine, when, as the evidence shows, I couldn't see anything at that time.

" 'Q. Due to the glare of the light on the approaching car? A. Yes.

" 'Q. How far were you traveling east of the edge of the highway towards the north when that glare showed into your eyes? A. Approximately two feet.

" 'Q. That is, the wheel was two feet on the inside, or the fender? A. I should say the wheel would be.

" 'Q. And how far does the fender extend to the right of the wheel, the right fender? A. about four to six inches. * * *

" 'Q. How far after you had struck the first obstacle did you travel before you struck the second? A. Might be 12 or 15 feet.

" 'Q. You were still blinded by the glare of these lights? A. No; the car had passed me, and I had struck deceased just at the time the car passed me.

" 'Q. Mr. Kennell, had you examined your brakes that day at all? A. Not that day, no. Examined them at same time the lights were adjusted.

" 'Q. Were your brakes in a condition so you could have stopped your car from the time of the glare of the approaching car shone through the window and the time you struck the first obstacle—did you have sufficient time to do that? A. I believe so, yes.

" 'Q. In other words, you could have stopped your car within the space of 150 feet if you wanted to? A. Yes.

" 'Q. But you did not? A. No, sir.

" 'Q. Was your car in such condition as to the brakes, both as to the emergency and hand brake, to permit you to stop or slow down to avoid the obstacle within the distance covered by your lights? A. You mean could I have stopped from the time I first seen the automobile coming? Yes. * * *

" 'Q. When were you first aware of the fact that you had struck a man, a pedestrian, Mr. Kennell? A. At the time I struck him.

" 'Q. You knew at once that you had struck a man? A. Yes, sir.

" 'Q. After you struck him, how far did you carry the body, if you did? A. I believe it was about 12 or 15 feet, or possibly more.

" 'Q. What portion of your car was the body carried along the highway on? A. I believe over the front headlight—the right headlight. * * * From the time I struck him I carried his body down the road about 12 or 15 feet. The body fell off the machine at that time. I felt two wheels pass over the body, and I had the brake on at the time and stopped. I stopped I presume 5 or 10 feet north of where the body fell to the ground from the car. * * * I am not entirely clear whether I came to a dead stop or not, but I know the car was in neutral and I looked behind to see if I could see anything and not being able to, I went on ahead.

" 'Q. You threw the clutch into neutral, do I understand, after you dropped the body? A. Yes, sir; that is, after I had stopped practically still, and if I was going at all, I was not going more than two or three or four or five miles an hour.

" 'Q. That is, after you had dropped the body? A. Yes. I went into second very slowly and until I could find a place to turn around. * * *

" 'Q. Was there anything to prevent you from bringing your car to a standstill at the time the lights glared through the windshield to your face? A. No.

" 'Q. But you didn't stop? A. No.'

"The above embraces a comprehensive, as well as an accurate, statement of the circumstances under which the accident occurred, so far as the only two witnesses who were present at the scene thereof when it happened knew or could give the circumstances.

"One Blasingame, a deputy sheriff, and one Ross, deputy coroner, who were the officers who returned with Kennell to the place where the accident occurred, shortly after the body of deceased was delivered at the morgue, made an examination of the highway and the ground where the accident happened. Testifying for defendant, those officers stated that they observed blood spots short distances apart on the paved portion of the highway, but saw no blood on the unpaved portion. One of the officers testified that he observed on the shoulder of the east side of the highway treadmarks of the tires of an automobile, but he expressed the opinion, based on appearances, that they were 'old marks' or had been made some time prior to the night of the accident. This testimony we do not regard as of particular consequence in the decision of the case.

[1-4] "The rule by which appellate courts must be guided in passing upon the question whether findings of fact or verdicts of juries are sufficiently supported by the evidence is this: 'That where an honest difference of opinion between men of average intelligence can arise as to the effect of the evidence—that is, if the evidence is such as that different conclusions upon the matter can rationally be drawn [from the evidence]—then the case presented is one for the jury, or the court, if the questions of fact be submitted to its arbitrament.' Firth v. Southern Pacific Co., 44 Cal. App. 511, 514, 186 P. 815, 816. There is, however, no place for that rule in the instant case. It is settled law that pedestrians have a right to travel anywhere upon a public highway, and it is, therefore, not negligence in them to do so. This is the common-law rule, and our Legislature has not changed or modified it. Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 482, 143 P. 743. Nor is a pedestrian under legal duty to look back or watch behind to see whether he or she is in danger of being struck or run down by any vehicle approaching him or her from the rear.

Raymond v. Hill, supra; Devecchio v. Ricketts, 66 Cal. App. 334, 226 P. 11; Idemoto v. Scheidecker, 193 Cal. 653, 226 P. 922. Of course, pedestrians, as is true of every person who travels over the highways by whatsoever means or mode, must exercise reasonable or the due amount of care, considering the conditions existing as to the highways, for their own safety. If they fail in the exercise of such care and themselves thereby contribute proximately to the cause of any injury they may sustain at the hands of one having an equal right to use the highways, or if such failure is the sole cause of the damage they have suffered, then, of course, they have no ground upon which to base just complaint.

[5, 6] "In the present case, however, there is no evidence whatever tending to show that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence or any negligence at all. In other words, the finding that the deceased, while returning to the point on the highway where he had left his car, 'was carelessly, recklessly, and negligently walking on said public highway' and was walking on said highway 'without giving or paying attention to the traffic on said highway or taking any care or precaution for his safety in the position in which he had placed himself' is wholly without evidentiary support. The testimony of Suran is that the deceased was walking on the unpaved portion of the highway immediately before the instant of time he was struck by Kennell's car. While, for sufficient reasons, as to which this court is not at liberty to enter upon an inquiry to determine whether they are or are not valid, the trial court could, as we must assume that it did, disregard Suran's testimony on that point, still his was the only testimony in the case which tended in the slightest degree to show precisely where the deceased was walking on the highway immediately before he received the mortal injuries. Kennell did not know, for he stated that he did not at any time see the deceased until after the latter was struck and his body carried on the fender of the car a distance of from 12 to 15 feet. Casting aside, then, as presumptively the trial court did, the testimony of Suran as to where and how the deceased was walking when struck by Kennell, the record furnishes absolutely no information as to where on the highway the deceased was walking, or whether he was or was not, while so walking, exercising reasonable care for his own safety under the peculiar circumstances and conditions by which he was then surrounded.

[7] "In this state of the case as to the matter now in hand, the presumption is that the deceased, while walking on the highway, was, at all times, exercising the requisite degree and amount of care for his own safety and preservation. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4; Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., 168 Cal. 500, 506, 143 P. 714, 716; Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 132 N. C. 852, 44 S. E. 618; Shannon v. Delwer, 68 Minn. 138, 71 N. W. 14. That presumption is, of course, subject to be controverted, 'but until controverted it is evidence in accordance with which the jury [or the court, as in this case] is bound to decide.' Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Min. Co., supra; Code Civ. Proc., § 1961. As, therefore, there is no evidence which supports the finding that deceased was guilty of negligence while walking along the highway, or immediately before or at the time he was struck, the said presumption stands undispelled and, consequently, as proof of the fact that the deceased exercised a due amount of care for his own safety at all times while walking on the highway.

[8] "The next question to be considered is whether the finding that Kennell was not driving the automobile 'in a careless and negligent manner,' and that the injuries to and the death of plaintiff's intestate were not proximately caused by 'any wrongful, careless, or negligent acts of the defendants, or either of them,' etc., derives support from the evidence.

"Section 22 of the State Vehicle Act (Stats. 1919, p. 220, which was the law in force when the injuries complained of here were received by deceased), provides, in part, as follows: 'Any person operating or driving a motor or other vehicle on the public highways shall operate or drive the same in a careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, and no person shall operate or drive a motor vehicle or other vehicle on a public highway at such rate of speed as to endanger the life or limb of any person or the safety of any property.'

"Section 20(a) of said act (Stats. 1915, p. 397, carried into the amending statute of 1919, Stats. 1919, p. 215), among other things, provides: 'The driver or operator of any vehicle in or upon any public highway shall drive or operate such vehicle in a careful manner with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians,' etc.

"The meaning of the foregoing sections, although in general language, is plain and can hardly be misunderstood by any person of ordinary intelligence. The language of the section first above quoted herein, to wit, 'careful and prudent manner and at a rate of speed not greater than is reasonable and proper,' is relative and contemplates the peculiar circumstances and conditions under which a car may be operated over a public highway at a particular time—whether it be after nightfall and dark or in the daytime and light, the width of the highway and whether it is one which, by reason of its connections, is or may naturally be expected to be at all times subject to a heavy or light traffic. In order words, said section requires the exercise of that amount of care in driving a motor vehicle over the highways which the circumstances or conditions of the particular occasion exact, having in view the character of the highway and the use to which it is then being put. As is said in 29 Cyc. pp. 428, 429: 'The care required must be in proportion to the danger to be avoided and the consequences that might reasonably be anticipated from the neglect. The greater the risk of danger the greater must be the care. What is ordinary care in a case of extraordinary danger would be extraordinary care in a case of ordinary danger.'

[9] "Under the circumstances of the present case—the narrowness of the unpaved portion of the highway, the darkness of the night and the blinding of Kennell by the glare of the lights reflected from the headlights of the approaching machine—the highway over which Kennell was traveling was beset by danger of an extraordinary character from the time his vision became so obscured as to make it impossible for him to see plainly the road before him to the time that he struck the deceased. Thus the ordinary care with which Kennell was charged in driving his car over the highway required such an amount of such care as was commensurate with the exactions of the extraordinary dangerous circumstances under which he was then operating his car. The respective rights and duties of drivers of automobiles and other vehicles and of pedestrians have repeatedly been by the courts of this state clearly pointed out. In Raymond v. Hill, 168 Cal. 473, 482, 484, 143 P. 743, 748, Judge Henshaw clearly points out and defines those rights and duties. After, in effect, declaring that a pedestrian, when using the public highways, may assume that the driver of an automobile approaching the former from the rear will so operate his car as to avoid colliding with or injuring him, and that failure to anticipate omission of such care does not render him negligent (see, also, on the proposition, Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 135, 131 P. 94; Deputy v. Kimmell, 73 W. Va. 595, 80 S. E. 919, 51 L. R. A. [N. S.] 989, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 656; Elliott on Streets and Roads [3d Ed.] § 1088), the court has the following to say with respect to the duty of drivers of automobiles: 'But as a part of the reasonable precaution which the law enjoins upon the driver of an automobile to use, is the necessity of making certain that foot passengers are aware of the rearward approach of the vehicle, that the vehicle itself is at such a distance from the pedestrian as to avoid running over him in his sudden panic from surprise at knowledge of its unexpected approach, and, finally, that the vehicle is under such control as that it may be stopped promptly.'

"The above rule is reasserted in Randolph v. Hunt, 41 Cal. App. 739, 183 P. 358.

"In Meyers v. Bradford, 54 Cal. App. 157, 201 P. 471, in which an application for a hearing by the Supreme Court was denied, this court, through the late Justice Burnett, approved, as accurately stating the law, the following instruction given at the trial: 'It is part of the duty of the operator of a motor vehicle to keep his machine always under control so as to avoid collisions with pedestrians and other persons using the highway. He has no right to assume that the road is clear, but under all circumstances and at all times he must be vigilant and must anticipate and expect the presence of others. Accordingly, the fact that he did not know that any one was on the highway is no excuse for conduct which would have amounted to recklessness if he had known that another vehicle or person was on the highway.'

"Woodhead v. Wilkinson, 181 Cal. 599, 185 P. 851, 10 A. L. R. 291, was a case where the driver of an automobile, approaching plaintiff from the rear, ran over and inflicted serious injuries upon her. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and it was found that defendant was negligent in that, when he realized that his vision was obscured by an approaching automobile so that he could not see the road before him, 'he failed to look around the side of the shield.' Complaint was made that said finding was insufficient to support a judgment for damages, the contention being, we assume (the opinion does not state the specific ground of the objection to the findings), that there was no duty cast upon the defendant under such circumstances to 'look around the end of the windshield.' The court said: 'Obviously, he would be bound as a careful driver to stop as soon as he could reach a place by the side of the road, or to place himself in a position from which he could see the road over which he was driving. He did not stop at once and if, under all the circumstances, looking around the end of the windshield was the only way in which he could safely proceed, then he was negligent in failing to adopt that plan. The same reason applies to the finding that he was negligent in failing to observe the highway immediately in front of the car which he was driving.'

[10] "That it is the duty of a driver of an automobile to anticipate the presence of pedestrians upon the highway over which he is thus traveling, is thoroughly settled as a part of the law of the road and is emphasized in Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 37, 179 P. 203, 205 (15 A. L. R. 401), and in Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, 127. In the first named of these cases it is said: 'Aside from the mandate of the statute, the driver of a motor vehicle is bound to use reasonable care to anticipate the presence on the streets of other persons having equal rights with himself to be there.'

"In the case last mentioned the court said: 'He (the driver) still remains bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop. Kessler v. Washburn, 157 Ill. App. 532; Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., 180 Cal. 32, 179 P. 203, 15 A. L. R. 401.'

[11] "Testing the conduct of the defendant Kennell, in operating his car on the occasion in question, by the rules and principles above set out, it is clear from his own testimony that he disregarded and violated every duty which the law imposes upon drivers of automobiles when driving the same over the public highways. In condensed form, his testimony may thus be recapitulated: (1) He was traveling, up to the time the glare reflected from the lights of the approaching automobile through the windshield of his car, at the rate of 25 miles an hour; (2) when the glare struck his eyes he was a distance of between 150 and 200 feet from where he collided with deceased; (3) the glare so obstructed his vision that he was unable to see an object on the highway before him, although his lights were in good condition and under ordinary circumstances he was able by them to discern an object before him at a distance of from 75 to 100 yards; (4) he did not see the deceased until after his car struck him; (5) when the glare first struck his eyes and blinded him, with the result as indicated, he diminished the speed of his car so that thereafter and until he struck deceased, he was still traveling at a speed of between 20 and 25 miles an hour; (6) he did not put on his brakes, nor turn off either the gas or ignition; (7) his brakes were in perfect order and he said he could have stopped his car between the time the glare first struck his eyes and the time he struck deceased, but that he did not do so, nor make any attempt to do so; (8) that he was not anticipating the presence of pedestrians on the highway in front of him—in fact, his mind, he himself in effect stated, was not on the matter of whether he might or might not overtake a pedestrian. It is only necessary to compare the foregoing résumé of Kennell's own testimony with the requirements of the law with respect to the duties of operators of automobiles when driving over the highways of the state to force the conclusion that, from the time the glare from the lights of the approaching car first reflected through his windshield into his eyes, he proceeded on until he struck and killed the deceased with a degree of indifference or recklessness as to the rights and safety of others who might be ahead of him on the highway closely approaching, if indeed, not amounting, under the circumstances, as revealed by his own testimony, to gross negligence.

[12, 13] "In view of a probable retrial, some of the assignments involving attacks upon rulings as to the admissibility of certain testimony should be noticed herein. The court struck out on motion of defendants a statement by the witness Suran to the effect that, shortly before the fatal collision, the deceased, who, the witness said, was then walking on the unpaved part of the road, kept warning and admonishing Suran to keep off the 'paved highway,' as probably 'somebody hit you.' The testimony stricken out was relevant, and, we think, competent, if not under the rule of res gestæ, certainly because it tended to disclose that the deceased had in his mind and fully realized, as he was walking along or over the highway just before he was struck, the perils or dangers of walking over the highway in the darkness of night, and further tended to show that, while thus engaged, he was exercising due care for his own safety. 'Wherever the bodily or mental feelings of an individual are material to be proved, the usual expressions of such feelings are original and competent evidence. Those expressions are the natural reflexes of what it might be impossible to show by other testimony. If there be such other testimony, this may be necessary to set the facts thus developed in their true light. * * * As independent explanatory or corroborative evidence, it is often indispensable to the due administration of justice. Such declarations are regarded as verbal acts, and are as competent as any other testimony, when relevant to the issue. Their truth or falsity is an inquiry for the jury.' Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Mosley, 75 U. S. (8 Wall.) 397, 404, 405 (19 L. Ed. 437); see, also, Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Hillmon, 145 U. S. 285, 296, 12 S. Ct. 909, 36 L. Ed. 711; Belleveau v. Lowe Supply Co., 200 Mass. 237, 86 N. E. 301; Payne v. Railway Co., 153 Iowa, 445, 133 N. W. 781. 'A person's mental state of fear is provable by his declarations, unless they are too remote.' 22 C. J. p. 281; see, also, People v. Fong Sing, 38 Cal. App. 253, 258, 259, 175 P. 911, and cases therein cited. The qualifying language of the rule, as it is last stated, has no application here, since the declarations of the deceased sought to be shown were, as seen, made but a few minutes prior to the accident, and had reference to just such a contingency as happened. As to the instances of the application of the rule of res gestæ, see the following cases: Rogers v. Manhattan Life Ins. Co., 138 Cal. 285, 290, 71 P. 348, and cases therein cited; Zipperlen v. S. P. Co., 7 Cal. App. 206, 220, 93 P. 1049; see, also, 2 Starkie on Evidence, 241; Phillips on Evidence (4th Am. Ed.) 185.

[14] "It was pertinent cross-examination as to a relevant matter for the plaintiff to ask Kennell whether he looked around the right or left side of his windshield to see whether he could discern an object before him while the glare still reflected through the windshield (Woodhead v. Wilkinson, supra), and also whether Kennell was anticipating that he might meet or overtake a pedestrian or other object on the highway. Zarzana v. Neve Drug Co., supra; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., supra. As to the matter of inquiry first stated, however, the question propounded to the witness was rather indefinite in form. As to the other matter, the said defendant thereafter admitted that he did not anticipate or think of meeting or overtaking any person or object on the highway in front of him. The rulings foreclosing proper inquiry into those matters would be erroneous and probably prejudicial under some circumstances.

"There are no other assignments calling for special attention herein."

For the foregoing reasons, it is ordered that the judgment be, and the same is, reversed.

MORENO MUT. IRR. CO. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 11764.)

Corporations ⟸298(2)—Meeting of directors of corporation at office rather than principal place of business proper under Code.

Meeting of directors of corporation at its office, as provided by by-laws, rather than principal place of business, as provided by articles of incorporation, was sufficient for creation of a bonded indebtedness, under Civ. Code, § 319, providing that meetings of directors must be held at its office or principal place of business.

In Bank.

Application by the Moreno Mutual Irrigation Company for a writ of mandate to be directed to Frank C. Jordan, Secretary of State, requiring him to file in his office certificate relative to creation of bonded indebtedness. Writ granted.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. F. Cleary, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petition for writ of mandate directing respondent, as secretary of state, to file in his office a certificate relative to the creation of a proposed bonded indebtedness of the petitioner, a corporation.

It appears that the refusal of respondent to file such certificate was based solely upon the fact that the meeting of the board of directors of the petitioner called for the express purpose of acting upon the necessary preliminary resolution for the creation of the proposed bonded indebtedness was not held at the "principal place of business" of the petitioner, as designated in its articles of incorporation, but was held at the "office" of petitioner, as provided by its by-laws.

Section 319 of the Civil Code provides:

"The meetings of the stockholders and board of directors of a corporation must be held at its office or principal place of business."

It is therefore apparent that by the plain provisions of the statute the board of directors of the petitioner was authorized to hold its meetings at its office.

It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed.

LESEM v. COLLIER, Judge. (L. A. 8735.)

1. Exceptions, bill of ⚖53(5)—Court's refusal to settle bill of exceptions to order striking affidavits proper, where transcript raises same issue.

On motion for new trial by defendant, plaintiff's motion to strike defendant's affidavits as not filed in time was granted. Defendant appealed from a judgment denying new trial and applied for transcript under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and also prepared bill of exceptions to order of court striking affidavits. Held, refusal of court to settle bill of exceptions was not error, since petitioner had proceeded under alternative method provided in section 953a of requesting a transcript or preparing bill of exceptions, and the action of the court in striking affidavits was sufficiently raised by the transcript.

2. Appeal and error ⚖873(3)—On appeal from judgment, court may review any order on motion for new trial.

On appeal from a judgment, the court may review any order on motion for new trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 956, so that order striking affidavits in motion for new trial was presented for review on application for transcript including all matters and orders arising on motion for new trial.

In Banc.

Application by Johanna Lesem for writ of mandate to be directed to Frank C. Collier, Judge of the Superior Court of County of Los Angeles, to compel settlement of bill of exceptions. Writ denied.

J. L. Murphy, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Paul Barksdale D'Orr and G. A. McElroy, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Petitioner is seeking a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as judge of one of the departments of the superior court of Los Angeles county, to settle a bill of exceptions. An action, entitled "Edith Terry v. Johanna Lesem et al.," was brought to trial in the court presided over by respondent, and findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against this petitioner were duly made and entered. Petitioner thereupon served and filed her notice of intention to move for a new trial. Subsequently she applied to the court for an extension of time within which to prepare, serve, and file affidavits in support of the motion, and the court made and entered an order granting 30 days additional to the time allowed by law. Thereafter petitioner served the affidavits upon the attorneys for the plaintiff in action and upon her codefendant, and filed the same with the clerk of the court. The plaintiff in the action thereupon served on petitioner notice of the hearing of the motion for a new trial on the day fixed, and, at the same time, gave notice that on the hearing of the motion she would move the court for an order striking the defendant's affidavits from the files, on the ground that they were filed too late. On the day following, petitioner served on plaintiff and upon her codefendant a notice that she would bring her motion on for hearing on the day noted by plaintiff, and would then move the court for a new trial upon the minutes of the court, the records and proceedings in the action, and upon her affidavits then on file.

When the parties appeared in court on the hearing of the several motions, the plaintiff moved the court to strike the affidavits from the files upon the ground that the same were not served and filed within the time prescribed by law. The defendant, in opposition to the motion to strike from the files, introduced in evidence the order of the court granting her additional time within which to file the affidavits, together with an unqualified acknowledgment of service of the notice of the extension of time upon counsel for plaintiff. The court, however, made its order striking the affidavits from the files, and thereupon proceeded to hear the motion for a new trial. After such hearing, the motion for a new trial was denied.

The petitioner then filed notice of appeal to the Supreme Court from the judgment made and entered in the action, and in her notice asked for a review of the order refusing her a new trial. She also filed with the clerk of the court a request for a transcript of the pleadings, proceedings, and evidence to be made up as a transcript on appeal under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In addition to the request for preparation of transcript, petitioner prepared a bill of exceptions containing the matters relating to the order of the court striking her affidavits from the files, which in due time she presented to the court for settlement. On the objection of the plaintiff in the action, the respondent refused to settle or sign the bill of exceptions on the ground that, as a transcript of the proceedings in the action had been required under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant was in position to have presented to this court for its consideration all the proceedings relating to the motion for a new trial, including the action of the court in striking out the affidavits, without the necessity of the preparation of any additional bill of exceptions. Thereupon the defendant applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel settlement and certification of the bill.

[1, 2] The action of the lower court in refusing to settle the bill of exceptions must be sustained. Petitioner is, of course, entitled to have the question of the correctness of the respondent's order striking her affidavits from the files in the proceedings on motion for a new trial considered by this court, and is entitled to have a record made up in order to properly present the question here; but, having elected to proceed under the alternative method, there was no necessity for the preparation or settlement of the bill of exceptions embodying the matters relating to the striking of her affidavits from the files. Upon an appeal from a judgment, the court may review any order on motion for a new trial. Code Civ. Proc., § 956. When any person desires to appeal from any judgment of the superior court to this court or any of the district courts of appeal, he may, in lieu of preparing and having settled a bill of exceptions, in order to present a record on appeal for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on such appeal, request that a transcript be made up, as provided in section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. That section, in part, provides that if the judgment, order, or decree appealed from be not included in a judgment roll, the party desiring to appeal shall, on the filing of the notice of the clerk that the transcript is about to be presented to the judge for his approval, specify such of the pleadings, papers, records, and files in the action as he desires to have incorporated in the transcript, in addition to the matters required by the section, "and the same shall be included." It appears by the return made and filed herein that, on the refusal of the respondent to certify and sign the bill of exceptions, the petitioner did file with the clerk of the court the additional or amended notice and request for a further transcript to include the matters, papers, and orders arising, considered and made on the motion for a new trial. No doubt, therefore, the proper proceedings will be embodied in the transcript on appeal which the petitioner has requested to be prepared.

For these reasons, the petition for the writ of mandate must be denied, and it is so ordered.

In re STEEHLER'S ESTATE.

STEEHLER et al. v. RILEY, State Controller.

(L. A. 8040.)

Appeal and error ⟸1222—Courts ⟸80(5)—Provision inserted by clerk in remittitur, that appellant should recover costs of appeal in inheritance tax case contrary to statute, held error; the court rule not controlling the statute.

Under St. 1921, p. 1520, § 17, subd. 5, providing that no undertaking shall be required from, or costs charged against, state comptroller in inheritance tax proceedings, where judgment of reversal in inheritance tax case made no provision for costs, clerk's remittitur providing that appellants, taxpayers, recover costs of appeal was error, Supreme Court rule 23 not controlling as against statute, and on proper motion remittitur will be recalled and such provision stricken.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William A. Steehler, deceased. On appeal of Rose H. Steehler and others from an order confirming the Inheritance Tax Appraiser's report and fixing the amount of tax to be paid by the deceased's widow, Ray L. Riley, as State Controller, appearing as respondent, the order was affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions (233 P. 972). On motion to recall the remittitur and strike from it a provision as to payment of costs of appeal. Motion granted, and remittitur recalled, corrected, and reissued.

Hunsaker, Britt & Cosgrove, of Los Angeles (John N. Cramer, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Ralph W. Smith, State Inheritance Tax Atty., and Wesley E. Marten, Asst. State Inheritance Tax Atty., both of Sacramento (Erwin P. Werner, Adrian C. Stanton, George S. Dennison, and Ida V. Wells, all of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This was an inheritance tax case. The decision of this court in reversing the judgment made no provision for the recovery of costs. The clerk, however, issued a remittitur containing the provision, "the appellants to recover costs of appeal." The present motion is to recall the remittitur and to strike from it the last-named provision. The motion is therefore limited to the question as to whether or not the costs on appeal were recoverable against this respondent. The Inheritance Tax Statute (Stats. 1921, p. 1520), § 17, subd. 5, provides, with reference to the state controller, that no undertaking shall "be required from or costs charged against the state controller * * * in any such proceeding." The statute was read into our decision and was a part of it. Rule 23 of this court could not, of course, prevail as against the statute. It follows, therefore, that the insertion of the words "appellants to recover costs of appeal" was in violation of the statute, was no part of our judgment, and was an inadvertence on the part of the clerk. The cases cited are not out of harmony touching this subject. The case of Petersen v. Civil Service Board (Cal. App.) 230 P. 196, was a case to which the rule of this court upon the subject of costs was properly applicable. The action of the clerk, therefore, in that case, was in conformity with our judgment and our rule, and it followed that the motion to recall the remittitur some time after the remittitur had been issued, for the purpose in reality of amending our judgment, could not prevail. Judge Knight's decision in that regard was correct, but that case has no application to the case before us. The case of San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Stevinson, 165 Cal. 540, 132 P. 1021, is directly in point, and points out the procedure to be followed in such cases by this court.

The motion is granted. The remittitur is recalled for the purpose of striking therefrom the provision, "the appellant to recover costs on appeal," and as corrected is ordered to issue forthwith.

Mandamus by the La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District against John H. Halley, President of its Board of Directors, and another as its Secretary. Peremptory writ to issue.

Crouch & Sanders, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondents.

Flint & MacKay and Arthur R. Smiley, all of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein seeks a writ of mandate directed to the respondents herein in their capacity, respectively, of president and secretary of the petitioner, an irrigation district, commanding the said respondents in their foregoing capacity to forthwith sign and attest certain bonds and coupons of said irrigation district as designated in its said application for said writ. The facts set forth in said application as the basis thereof substantially show that the petitioner is, and for some period prior to the filing of said application was, an irrigation district duly organized and existing as such under the laws of the state of California, and that the respondents were and are the duly elected, qualified, and acting officers thereof; that on April 5, 1924, one Ed Fletcher, sole surviving partner of a certain copartnership doing business under the firm name and style of the Cuyamaca Water Company, gave to the petitioner herein an option to purchase a certain water system then and theretofore owned by said copartnership on and along the San Diego river in the county of San Diego, state of California, for the sum of $1,100,000; that the petitioner duly accepted said option, and thereafter, and by an order of the board of directors of said petitioner, duly authorized and taken pursuant to a petition of the requisite number of the qualified electors within said irrigation district requesting the same, a special election was called, to be held within said irrigation district on the 7th day of November, 1924, at which election there was to be submitted to the electors of said district the question as to whether or not bonds of said district should be issued in the sum of $2,500,000 in par value for the purpose of acquiring said water system of said Cuyamaca Water Company, and also of acquiring waters, water rights, reservoir sites, and other property for the use and purposes of said district in order to enable it to carry out and comply with the provisions of the California Irrigation District Act (St. 1897, p. 254) under which it was organized, and any other act supplementary thereto authorizing such districts to acquire property and construct works. That said election was thereafter duly and regularly held on the 7th day of November, 1924, at which said election a majority of the said qualified electors of said district voted in favor of the issuance of such bonds. Copies of said order and call of said bond election and of the notice thereof and of the propositions submitted thereat and of the vote of the electors of said district voting at said election and of the canvass showing the result thereof are attached as exhibits to said application. That thereafter, and on November 10, 1924, the board of directors of said district, by resolution duly passed and adopted, provided and directed that in conformity with the Constitution and laws of the state of California and of the proceedings theretofore had and taken by said district, and pursuant to the said bond election thus held in conformity therewith, a bonded indebtedness of said district be created in the principal sum of $2,500,000, and that in evidence thereof bonds of said district be issued in and to the extent of said sum consisting of 2,500 bonds of the denomination of $1,000 each, and in the form specified by law. That thereafter the said board of directors of said district, pursuant to the proceedings theretofore had, caused 2,500 bonds of said district in said amount and in due form to be prepared and presented to the respondents herein as the president and secretary, respectively, of said irrigation district for their, and each of their, respective signatures and attestation, and requested said officials to so sign and attest the same and the interest coupons attached thereto, but that the said respondents, as said officials of said district, respectively have refused and continued to refuse to sign or attest said bonds or any of them or the interest coupons attached thereto or any of them. Following these averments the petitioner presents certain alleged urgent reasons for the presentation of its said application to this court, and prays for the issuance of said writ. The petitioner herein did not in its said application undertake to set forth or enlighten this court as to the reasons proffered by the respondents herein for their and each of their refusal to sign and attest said bonds, but, notwithstanding the defect in their said application in that regard, an alternative writ of mandate was issued and made returnable before this court at a later date. In response to said alternative writ of mandate the respondents herein appeared and presented their and each of their return to said writ, wherein they purported to set forth fully the facts and reasons upon which their and each of their refusal to sign and attest said bonds was predicated, and by so doing eked out the deficiencies of the petitioner's application in that regard. In their said return to said writ the respondents set forth the fact that the petitioner was organized on the 1st day of November, 1913, under the provisions of an act of the Legislature approved March 31, 1897, providing for the organization of irrigation districts and under the various acts amendatory thereof up to and including the date of its said organization. That under the terms of said prior acts certain provisions and requirements were specified relating to the vote of the qualified electors within the boundaries of each irrigation district, whereby its organization was to be accomplished and the benefits and burdens attendant upon and following such organization were defined. The respondents aver that by virtue of such organization of said irrigation district, under the terms of said original and amendatory acts of the Legislature as they existed at the date thereof, a contract was created by operation of law between the state of California and the persons whose property was affected by the creation and organization of said irrigation district, under the terms and conditions of which the property owners of said district consented to the imposition upon themselves and their lands of such burdens in the way of bond issues as were to be resolved upon, voted, and issued in the manner provided by the aforesaid acts of the Legislature as the same existed at the date of the said organization of said irrigation district, and not otherwise. The respondents proceed to aver that, since the organization of said district, the Legislature has adopted various acts amendatory of the aforesaid acts in existence at the time of the formation of said district, by the terms of which numerous changes have been made in the manner and method by which irrigation districts may issue bonds; and particularly has changed the provisions of section 30 of said original act in the respect that said original section provided that, as a prerequisite to the calling of a special election to determine the question as to whether or not bonds should issue, a petition by a majority of the holders of title representing a majority in value of the lands in said district according to the equalized assessment roll thereof was required; whereas, by the change or changes made in said original section by said subsequent acts or amendments thereof, a petition signed by 500 electors residing within said district and including the holders of title representing 20 per cent. in value of said lands instead of a majority in value thereof, as provided in said former act, was required. In addition to this alleged radical change in this particular section of the law as it read at the date of the organization of said district, the respondents set forth numerous other changes in the law affecting the issuance of bonds within such districts and also affecting the manner and method of the sale of such bonds and the provisions to be made for the payment thereof. The respondents also point out other changes effected by said subsequent legislation relating to the working methods of such irrigation districts differing materially from those contemplated by said prior acts in force at the time of the organization of said district, all of which the respondents aver were effected without the consent or knowledge of the landowners within said district, and all of which were in violation of the aforesaid contract alleged to have been created between the state of California and the said landowners of said district by the organization of said district under such pre-existing laws. The respondents further aver that the bonds of said district which were voted to be issued as alleged in the petition herein, were purported to be voted for and authorized under such later statutes and under the changed terms and conditions created thereby, and hence have been voted for, authorized, and attempted to be issued in violation of said contract, and are void, and that therefore the respondents have acted properly in their refusal to sign or attest said bonds or the coupons attached thereto, for the additional reason that said later enacted laws, under which said bonds have been attempted to be voted for and issued, are not only in violation of said contract, but are also in violation of the provisions of the federal Constitution, which prohibit any state from enacting laws impairing the obligations of contracts; and also of the provisions of said Constitution and of the state Constitution forbidding the taking of private property without due process of law.

The respondents set forth in their return as another and further reason why they and each of them were and are justified in their refusal to sign and attest said bonds the following facts: They aver that theretofore, and on the 14th day of May, 1914, an election was duly and regularly called and held within said irrigation district at which there was submitted to the qualified electors thereof the question as to whether bonds of said district to the amount of $1,232,500 should be issued for the purpose of acquiring water, water rights, and other property, constructing necessary irrigation canals and works, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of said district and the provisions of the act under which the same was organized. That said election was called and held, and said proposed bond issue submitted to said electors of said district under a certain plan prepared by the hydraulic engineer of said district, and which contemplated the utilization of a certain underground storage basin lying at the lower end of El Cajon Valley in the county of San Diego by sinking wells and by the installation of pumping plants at said point; and also contemplated the building of a dam and the creation of a storage reservoir in the gravel beds of said region at a sufficient elevation to enable the consumers of water within said district to be supplied with gravity water. That said election was called and held in the manner provided by section 30 of the Irrigation District Act, as the same stood at the time of such election, and resulted in the favorable vote of the requisite number of the electors of said district upon the issuance of said bonds. That thereafter, and pursuant to said election, the board of directors of said district caused bonds of said district in said amount of $1,232,500 to be prepared and signed by the proper officers thereof, and that thereafter there were sold and disposed of during the years 1914, 1915, and 1916 of said bonds the amount of $66,000 in par value thereof and no more, which latter amount of said bonds, with the exception of $10,000 in par value thereof redeemed by said district, are now outstanding in the hands of bona fide purchasers thereof. That the proceeds of said bonds so sold and disposed of were used by said district for the purpose of carrying out the plans and work provided for in the said engineer's report, but that the remainder of said authorized issue of such bonds amounting to the sum of $1,166,500 in par value thereof remained in the custody of said district available for the uses for which the same were voted, but not availed of by their sale or disposition therefor. That thereafter, and while said bonds so remained unsold and undisposed of by said district, the board of directors of said district, purporting to act under sections 106, 107, and 108 of said Irrigation Act, called and held an election of the qualified electors of said district for the purpose of the election of directors thereat, and also for the purpose of voting upon a proposition to destroy all of said remaining unsold bonds. The respondents proceed to set forth a number of respects in which said election was irregular and not in conformity with law, and then proceed to aver that at said election the votes of the qualified electors voting thereat were unanimously in favor of the destruction of said bonds; and that thereafter and pursuant to said election and on the 7th and 8th days of March, 1923, the directors of said district destroyed said unissued bonds. The respondents aver that said proceedings for the destruction of said bonds, and which were consummated in the destruction thereof, were wholly irregular, insufficient, and void, and without authorization by the voters of said district, but that the same was accomplished at a time when the directors of said district had abandoned the plan of water development set forth in the report of the said hydraulic engineer of said district, upon the basis of which said first bond election had been called, and had for some years previous thereto been and then were purchasing water for the use of the inhabitants of said district from the Cuyamaca Water Company. The respondents aver that these bonds are still existing and valid obligations of the district, notwithstanding their attempted revocation and destruction, and that as such the sum represented in their par value is still available for the purposes for which the new bond issue has been voted, and hence that the issuance of said new bonds was unnecessary, and for that reason improper, and that respondents were and are justified in their refusal to sign and attest the same.

The respondents, as a further return to said alternative writ and additional reason for their refusal to comply with its mandate, allege that the option referred to in the petitioner's application providing for the purchase of the Cuyamaca Water Company's system to be paid for through the issue and sale of the bonds in question contains a provision by the terms and agreements of which the petitioner, if such option is exercised, is to sell and transmit to the Cuyamaca Water Company water at the fixed rate of 9 cents per 1,000 gallons to be used in furnishing water for domestic uses to the inhabitants of the city of East San Diego and certain other communities lying outside of the boundaries of said irrigation district; and this, the respondents aver, the district has no legal authority to do or agree to do, and hence said option is in that regard ultra vires and void as beyond the power of said irrigation district to perform, and hence that the portion of said bond issue providing the amount of money necessary for the exercise of said option and the fulfillment of the terms and conditions thereof would be illegal and the bonds issued and to be sold therefore void. Wherefore the respondents pray that the alternative writ issued herein be dismissed and the permanent writ sought herein be denied.

[1] To the foregoing return of the respondents herein the petitioner rests its response upon a demurrer, and by so doing admits the averments of fact embraced therein. We shall therefore take up the legal questions involved in the application for said writ and the response thereto in the order of their presentation. The first contention of the respondents herein is that, since the petitioner herein was organized as an irrigation district in the year 1913 by a vote of the electors therein acting under the provisions of the irrigation district act of 1897 and the acts amendatory thereto in existence at the date of its said organization, the organization of said district by that means thereunder constituted a contract between the state and the individual property owners, who as such electors voted to thus create said irrigation district, the obligations of which could not be changed or impaired by subsequent legislation. In making this contention the respondents chiefly rely upon the case of Merchants' Nat. Bank of San Diego v. Escondido Irrigation District, 144 Cal. 329, 77 P. 937. That was a case wherein the plaintiff was the trustee in two deeds of trust executed by the directors of the defendant, an irrigation district, as security for two series of bond issues, and which purported to convey to the trustee the whole water system of the district as well as all of the other properties thereof. This trust deed was given under the supposed authority of section 17 of the Wright Act, as amended March 11, 1893 (Stats. 1893, p. 175). The original act under which the said irrigation district was organized contained no such grant of powers to the directors of such districts, their powers thereunder being expressly confined to the issuance of bonds payable out of revenues derivable from annual assessments upon the real property within the district. Stats. 1887, pp. 29–45. The court held the provision in said original act thus limiting the powers of the board of directors of such corporation was in the nature of a contract between the state and the individual property owners of said district who had organized it pursuant to its limitations upon the powers of directors and which could not be changed by said subsequent legislation so as to lay the particular liability and burden upon their property. While the conclusion was, we think, correct as applied to the facts of that particular case, it is being attempted by the respondents herein to give to its language an application far beyond the intendment of the court in that decision. It was not our intention in that case to hold that, as to the general powers of irrigation districts, or as to the methods of their management and conduct, or as to the method or manner of issuing bonds for the purpose of carrying on the work of said districts or fulfilling the purposes of their organization, such districts were to be limited or the people or property owners within the same confined to the precise terms of the statutes in force at the time of the organization thereof. Indeed, in later cases, and with respect to public agencies and utilities of the same general character as irrigation districts, the courts of this state have laid down a different rule. In the case of Spurrier v. Neumiller, 37 Cal. App. 683, 174 P. 338, the question involved was that of the power of the Legislature to amend the Reclamation District Act (St. 1911, p. 639) so as to change the method of collecting assessments from that existing under the statutes in force at the time of the organization of the district, and to otherwise alter the procedure incident to the operation thereof. The court in that case adopted the broad principle enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Wisconsin & M. R. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 24 S. Ct. 107, 48 L. Ed. 229, wherein it was stated that—

"The broad ground in a case like this is that, in view of the subject-matter, the Legislature is not making promises, but framing a scheme of public revenue and public improvement. In announcing its policy and providing for carrying it out it may open a chance for benefits to those who comply with its conditions, but it does not address them, and therefore it makes no promise to them. It simply indicates a course of conduct to be pursued, until circumstances or its views of policy change. It would be quite intolerable if parties not expressly addressed were to be allowed to set up a contract on the strength of their interest in and action on the faith of a statute, merely because their interest was obvious and their action likely, on the face of the law."

In the case of Fallbrook Irrigation District v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 S. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369, the Supreme Court of the United States further declared that—

"The formation of irrigation districts is accomplished by proceedings so closely analogous to those prescribed for the formation of swamp-land reclamation districts that the decisions with respect to the latter are authority as to the former."

[2, 3] The close similarity between those public or state agencies, which are denominated irrigation districts, and those other, and to a larger degree similarly empowered and conducted, public or state agencies, which are denominated municipal corporations, being thus established and declared, the general principles which are applicable to the one should also be susceptible of application to the other; and these general principles, in so far as they have relation to the legislative control over the organization, management, conduct, and manner and method of creating and of liquidating their obligations, have so frequently been expounded as to render any extended comment upon the many cases defining and applying the same unnecessary in relation to the instant case. These general principles have been thus broadly and tersely stated in 6 Ruling Case Law, at section 337 thereof, under the title Constitutional Law, as follows:

"In determining whether a statute affecting a municipal corporation operates as an impairment of the obligation of a contract, regard must be had to the distinction between the rights of such a corporation in its public or governmental capacity and its private rights. So far as a municipality is an agency of government, it has no rights or powers which, as between it and the state, the legislature may not modify or abrogate at pleasure. Neither the charter of a municipal corporation, nor any legislative act regulating the use of property held by it for governmental or public purposes, is a contract within the meaning of the federal constitution," citing many cases.

[4] In so far as any language employed in the case of Merchants' National Bank, etc., v. Escondido, etc., supra, would seem to be in conflict with these later authorities, it must be deemed to be overruled. The respondents herein, however, make the contention that this court, in the recent case of Peery v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 753, 203 P. 992, 19 A. L. R. 1044, has approved in its broadest application the doctrine which the respondents insist was declared in that decision; but an examination of the later case will disclose that the doctrine that the Legislature may not change the law governing the issue and terms of disposition of bonds by cities was given application to a condition wherein certain bonds of the city of Los Angeles had already been voted and issued prior to the making of a change in the law permitting such bonds to be disposed of below par in contravention of the terms of the law in existence at the time of the election, whereby the electors voted to issue and sell the bonds of the city at par and not otherwise. It is clear that no such question is presented in the instant case, and nothing said therein can be interpreted as warranting the application of the doctrine applicable to the particular facts of the earlier case to the situation presented in the case at bar. There are certain particular contentions urged by the respondents in their assault upon the subsequent legislation as affecting an irrigation district coming into being under an earlier state of the law, as, for example, the respondents aver that the law was changed as to the amount in value of land to be represented by the electors voting upon the question as to the issuance of bonds, and that such change in the law constituted a violation of the alleged contract between the owners of such lands and the state created in the organization of said districts under the earlier state of the law. In the case of In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 320, 28 P. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106, it was, however, held that the question as to the proportion of land to be held by those imposing by their vote a burden upon the owners of the lands within the district was a matter purely addressed to the discretion of the Legislature in the first instance; and, if so, then the change in the law in that regard would be, as was said in that case, "but an incident and not of the essence of the matter," and the same may be said of the various other changes in the law having relation to the manner and method of levying and collecting assessments for the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds of the district and of the fixation and collection of tolls and charges for the use of the water thereof. These are all matters which the Legislature may change and adjust at will with relation to these public agencies, at least until such time as definite private rights have been acquired and become vested under a prior state of the law. None such have thus far been shown to exist in so far as this first contention of the respondents is concerned and we are therefore of the opinion that there is no merit in their said contention.

[5] The second contention which the respondents make is based upon the showing made in their said return to the alternative writ issued herein to the effect that there had been a prior issue of bonds voted for by said district to the amount in par value of $1,232,500, of which but $66,000 worth in par value had actually been issued and sold, and that as to said unissued bonds the electors of the district had voted to revoke and destroy the same under the provisions of sections 106, 107, and 108 of the Irrigation District Act, but which vote and the election at which the same was authorized was for certain reasons assigned by the respondents irregular and void, and hence said unissued bonds have continued to be and are validly voted and existing bonds of said district and available as such for sale and for the application of their proceeds to the purposes for which the present bond issue is sought, and hence that such present bond issue is unnecessary and the respondents are therefore justified in their refusal to sign and attest said bonds presently sought to be issued and sold. Section 106 of the Irrigation District Act (Stats. 1897, pp. 254–286) provides as follows:

"Whenever there remains in the hands of the board of directors of any irrigation district heretofore organized, or organized under the provisions of this Act, after the completion of its ditch system, and the payment of all demands against such district, any bonds voted to be issued by said district, but not sold, and not necessary to be sold for the raising of funds for the use of such district, said board of directors may call a special election for the purpose of voting upon a proposition to destroy said unsold bonds, or so many of them as may be deemed best, or may submit such proposition at a general election."

It would seem from a reading of this section of said act that, as a prerequisite to the exercise of the power given to the board of directors of an irrigation district to call an election for the purpose of voting upon a proposition to destroy unsold bonds, the said board of directors must have made a finding to the fact of the "completion of its ditch system and the payment of all demands against such district," and also that the bonds voted to be issued by said district, but not sold, were "not necessary to be sold for the use of said district." Upon the hearing had upon the return on the alternative writ issued herein it was stipulated that the board of directors did in fact make an oral finding as to the foregoing facts at the time of the issuance of its call for said election. It is the contention of the respondents, first, that said oral findings would not be sufficient; and, second, that such findings, even if sufficient in form, would not be in accord with the facts. As to the first of these contentions it has been decided that the findings of bodies of this character as to the existence of particular facts upon which their orders are to be predicated need not be in writing, unless the statute so expressly requires. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350–356, 80 P. 81. As to the second of said contentions, if we are to assume that the said findings of the board of directors would not, in the absence of fraud, be conclusive upon these respondents as the merely administrative officials of the district, and this we do not decide, it seems clear to us that the respondents herein have alleged themselves out of court, since it affirmatively appears upon the face of their said return that the original bond issue was voted for the purpose, in a large part at least, for the development of a water system according to plans of the then engineer of the district, and that the said irrigation district, after the expenditure of the sum of $66,000 of the money derived from the sale of a corresponding portion of the said first bond issue for the purposes and in furtherance of the project for which said bonds were thus voted, definitely abandoned the same, for the reason that such plans for the provision of a water and ditch system proved to be impractical, and proceeded to provide a water and ditch system for the uses of said district from other sources and to supply the same to the inhabitants thereof for irrigation and domestic uses through a distributing system owned and maintained by the Cuyamaca Water Company under a contract for the acquisition and distribution of said water with the latter. It thus appears that, while the plans for a water supply and ditch system for the development of which said earlier issue of bonds was voted had been long since abandoned as apparently impractical, the said irrigation district did in fact have a complete water and ditch system for the distribution and use of water at the date when it was so found by the board of directors thereof and when said board directed that an election be called and held for the purpose of voting upon the question of the revocation and destruction of said bonds. These affirmative averments on the part of the respondents place the matter in a position wherein we are disposed to hold that the findings of the board to the effect that the ditch system of the district had so far reached completion that the bonds formerly voted to be issued by the district, but not sold, were no longer necessary to be sold for the raising of money for use of said district for the purposes for which such unused bonds had been voted cannot be held by us to be contrary to the fact. It would thus sufficiently appear that the purposes for which such bonds were issued, in so far as practical, had been subserved, and that said bonds under the plans for the carrying into effect of which they had been voted could not be made available for the later developed purposes for which the new issue of bonds was to be required.

[6] It would be altogether too narrow an interpretation of section 106 of the Irrigation District Act to hold that, when bonds have been voted for the construction of a ditch system for an irrigation district, and have been partially devoted to that purpose, and when the plans for such construction have been found to be impractical and have been abandoned, and when the district has by contract or otherwise provided itself and its inhabitants with another and complete ditch system, it may not in good faith revoke and destroy its unissued remainder of such bonds by acting in accordance with the procedure outlined in sections 106, 107, and 108 of the Irrigation District Act. With regard to the averments of the respondents' return to the effect that the election ordered and held in said district in attempted conformity with these sections of said act was irregular in certain designated respects, it was stipulated at the hearing upon the return to said alternative writ that the said election was called and held in substantial compliance with the provisions of sections 107 and 108 of said act. It seems to be conceded, however, that there were certain irregularities in the conduct of said election, as, for instance, that the notice of said election did not contain a number of the matters required to be set forth therein by the terms of section 107 of the act; and also that the proposition as printed on the ballot was not precisely in the form prescribed by said section. If, however, the board of directors of the district had, as we have interpreted its stipulated findings, properly determined that the basic facts for the calling and holding of such an election existed, it had acquired jurisdiction to call and hold the same; and, this being so, and said section 107 having provided that "such election shall be held in the same manner as other elections held under the provisions of this act," it would seem to follow that whatever departures there may have been from the precise directions of said section would constitute mere irregularities in the calling and conduct of the same. By reference to section 30 of said act which provides the procedure for calling and holding bond elections, we find practically the same procedure as that provided for in section 107 of the act. By the terms of section 30 of said act it is provided that—

"No informalities in conducting such election shall invalidate the same, if the election shall have been otherwise fairly conducted."

By the terms of section 71 of said act, which has reference to the institution and trial of actions contesting the validity of bond elections, it is provided that—

"The court hearing any of the contests herein provided for, in inquiring into the regularity, legality, or correctness of such proceedings, must disregard any error, irregularity, or omission which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties to said action or procéeding."

The foregoing sections of said act received the careful consideration of this court in the case of Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation District, 173 Cal. 660, 161 P. 113, and were therein held to be adequate to foreclose an attack upon a proceeding based upon mere irregularities or upon a failure to comply with statutory requirements which the Legislature might in the first instance have failed to enact.

[7] It is therefore evident, both from the absence of any averment or showing of the respondents to the contrary, but also from their stipulation, as well as from the fact that at said election the electors who voted thereat voted unanimously in favor of the destruction of said bonds, that no substantial rights of the said district or of the property owners or electors thereof were injuriously affected by any of the alleged irregularities in the calling or holding of said election or by the destruction of said bonds which was effectuated as a result thereof.

[8] The final contention which the respondents make is that the provision in the option agreement by which the water supply and ditch system of the Cuyamaca Water Company is to be acquired through the medium of the recently voted bond issue, to the effect that the district, if such option is exercised, is to sell to the said company a sufficient quantity of water to enable it to supply water to certain regions outside of the boundaries of the irrigation district, is a void provision, and hence that the entire option is void, and thus forms no sufficient basis for the issuance of the bonds in question, and that they are therefore justified in refusing to sign or attest the same. This contention has no merit. Hewitt v. Pleasant Valley Irrigation Dist., 124 Cal. 186, 56 P. 893; South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 579, 93 P. 490; Byington v. Sacramento Valley, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 124, 148 P. 791.

It is our conclusion from the foregoing considerations that the respondents herein have failed to show any sufficient justification for their and each of their failure and refusal to sign and attest the bonds in question and the coupons attached thereto, and that the peremptory writ should issue as prayed for. It is so ordered.

SHEEHAN v. BOARD OF POLICE COM'RS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 11574.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜187—Determination of board of police commissioners whether disability of pensioned officer has ceased has no legal effect.

San Francisco Charter, art. 8, c. 10, § 3, relating to police pensions, gives board of police commissioners, sitting as trustees of pension fund, power to determine in first instance whether disability of officer pensioned has ceased, but such determination is only an indication of board's course of action and has no legal effect whatever.

2. Municipal corporations ⊜187 — Pensioned policeman entitled to judicial determination of question whether disability ceased.

Under San Francisco charter, relative to police pensions, a policeman has a vested right to retain place on retired list and have pension continue until disabilities have ceased, and is entitled to a judicial determination by a competent court of facts upon which it is claimed right has ceased.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜187 — Pensioned policeman's conduct to board of police commissioners held not contemptuous.

In mandamus to prevent removal from pension list, unassailed finding that petitioner objected to jurisdiction of board of police commissioners and refused to be examined, unless his doctor was present, held not to show that petitioner's conduct was contemptuous.

4. Mandamus ⊜13—Pensioned policeman need not exhaust remedies within police department to prevent removal from pension list before appeal to courts.

In mandamus to prevent removal from pension list, petitioner need not exhaust remedies within police department before appeal to courts, board of police commissioners having no judicial authority.

5. Appeal and error ⊜1050(1)—Evidence ⊜571(1)—Testimony of physician, as to competency of disabled policeman to do police duty, entitled to some weight, and not prejudicial, where other testimony of physical condition.

In an action to determine whether disabilities of pensioned policeman had ceased, testimony of a skilled physician, who had attended him as to his competency to perform police duty, was entitled to some weight, and was not prejudicial to defendants, where physician's testimony was not the only evidence before the court of policeman's physical condition.

6. Municipal corporations ⊜181 — Board of police commissioners in pension hearings have only ministerial powers.

Board of police commissioners under San Francisco charter, relating to police pensions, when acting to determine whether disability of officer has ceased, so as to require his removal from pension list, have only ministerial powers and no judicial powers.

7. Municipal corporations ⊜187—Charge of policeman's "insubordination" held without foundation.

Since board of police commissioners was without jurisdiction to judicially determine whether disability of pensioned policeman had ceased, charge of "insubordination" in such proceedings was without foundation, such charge requiring refusal to obey some order which superior officer is entitled to give and entitled to have obeyed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Petition by James F. Sheehan against the Board of Police Commissioners of the City and County of San Francisco, for writs of mandate to compel defendants to refrain from declaring his disability terminated, and restoring him to duty as a police officer. From a judgment granting the writs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 188 Cal. 525, 206 P. 70.

Rehearing denied; SEAWELL and SHENK, JJ., dissenting.

George Lull, City Atty., and Charles S. Perry, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Chas. J. Heggerty and Peter F. Dunne, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. A petition for hearing of the appeal herein, after a decision thereon by Division 1 of the First Appellate District of the District Court of Appeal, was granted by this court. Further consideration of the questions presented by the appellants and the petitioners has led to the conclusion that that part of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, as prepared by Mr. Justice

St. Sure of that court (hereinafter quoted), correctly expresses, in all essential particulars, the views of this court with reference thereto. It is as follows:

"Petitioner obtained writs of mandate and prohibition against defendants, as the board of police commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco, and as the board of police relief and pension fund commissioners of the police department of said city and county, and also against the members of said board of police commissioners, also against said members as trustees of the police relief and pension fund. It was decreed that the action taken by defendants as trustees of the police relief and pension fund, and as a board of police pension fund commissioners, finding that the disability of petitioner had ceased, and that his pension shall cease; that he be removed from the pension roll; that he be restored to service and report to the 'acting chief of police' for active duty, were a deprivation of petitioner's vested right, and were void. And it was further decreed that the findings be set aside; that petitioner be restored to the pension roll, and that the pension to which he is entitled be paid to him; that petitioner recover his costs in the sum of $11.50, and for damages sustained by him in being deprived of the payment of his pension from November 15, 1920, he be allowed legal interest on the amount of the pension due and to become due until the same be paid to him. The judgment directed that a peremptory writ of mandate issue requiring defendants to perform the matters decreed. It was also adjudged that defendants be prohibited from proceeding to hear the charge now pending before them for insubordination, or any charge against petitioner based upon the alleged claim that the disability of petitioner had ceased. Defendants appeal from the judgment.

"Petitioner was appointed a member of the police department September 20, 1895, with rank of patrolman. On August 1, 1899, he became physically disabled while in the performance of duty. While breaking a horse to saddle for the police department the horse shied, reared, and fell backward and upon petitioner, who received injuries about the head and body resulting in total deafness in the right ear and injuries to his brain which superinduced epileptic convulsions. He was retired on a pension of $50 per month to be paid during his life and to cease on his death. The San Francisco charter (article 8, c. 10, § 3) provides that in case his disability shall cease his pension shall cease. In January, 1904, petitioner was arbitrarily removed from the pension roll and was ordered to report for active duty, failing which he was dismissed from the police department. Litigation to annul such proceedings was then commenced and was finally terminated by the decision of this court June 3, 1920. See Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 47 Cal. App. 29, 190 P. 51, and its companion case, 47 Cal. App. 793, 190 P. 55. The remittitur was certified to the clerk of the court below, and on July 6, 1920, the defendants were served with the peremptory writ of mandate. Defendants met as the board of pension fund commissioners on that date, spread the writ on the minutes, restored petitioner to the pension roll in accordance with the writ, and immediately adopted a resolution ordering him to appear before two physicians of the pension board 'for examination as to whether the physical disability upon which he was retired on October 6, 1903, has ceased.' He was excused from appearing on this occasion, but later he was directed to appear before the board on September 27, 'for the purpose of enabling the board to determine whether or not the disability, because of which he was retired on pension, has ceased, and whether or not he should be restored to service in the rank occupied by him at the time of his retirement.' The matter was continued by consent from time to time until November 15, 1920, when petitioner appeared before the board, and certain proceedings were had to be hereinafter mentioned.

"Petitioner applied to the superior court for a writ of mandate, and also for a writ of prohibition. After issue joined, trial was had with the result noted in the first paragraph of this opinion.

"Defendants contend that this case is a direct challenge of the power of the board of police commissioners to try a member of the department, and say that two simple questions are presented for decision as follows:

" '1. Does the charter of San Francisco give the power to the board of police commissioners, sitting as trustees of the compensation fund, to determine in the first instance whether or not a pensioner's disability has ceased?

" '2. Can a police officer, charged with an offense against the rules of the department, openly defy the board, refuse to be tried, and prevent his trial by a writ of prohibition?'

[1] "(1) The charter commits the administration of the pension fund to the board of police commissioners sitting as trustees of the pension fund. The authority of the board is found in chapter 10, art. 8, of the charter relating to police relief and pension fund, and defendants argue that section 3 thereof gives to the board the power to inquire into petitioner's condition in a case where it is believed that a pensioner's disability has ceased. What defendants are really contending for is the right of the board of police commissioners, sitting as trustees of the pension fund, to exercise judicial powers. This question was fully and completely answered by the Supreme Court in the case of French v. Cook, 173 Cal. 126, 160 P. 411, and by this court in Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, 47 Cal. App. 29, 190 P. 51, involved in the instant proceeding. In French v. Cook, the Supreme Court points out that there is no provision in the present charter of San Francisco confiding to the board of police commissioners, acting in any of its capacities, the power to finally determine any question of fact in connection with such a pension. Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, at page 35, 190 P. 54. 'The board is apparently in the same position,' says the Supreme Court, in French v. Cook, supra, 'with relation to such matter as is any officer required by law to do a prescribed act in a certain contingency, where no certain method is provided by law for the ascertainment of the facts. Under such circumstances, it may often be true that there is uncertainty or dispute as to the facts, but in such a case the only resort of the officer is such investigation as he may be able to himself make for the purpose of determining his own course of action. His determination as to the facts, however, is not effectual for any other purpose.

If not satisfied as to the evidence of the essential facts he may refuse to act until required to do so by the judgment of some tribunal invested with the power to finally determine such controversy, but before such tribunal any conclusion to which he may have come on the facts has no legal force whatever. The sole question there is whether the facts are in reality such as to require the performance of the act, and this altogether regardless of the officer's conclusion as to the facts. The party having a vested right in the performance of the act, if the facts are as claimed by him, has also the right to have his claim as to the facts judicially determined. The functions of the board in such a matter as this are really ministerial only, and come under the same principle as would apply in the case of county or city auditor, in so far as any finality to his conclusions are concerned. * * * As we read the charter, it gives no judicial function whatever to the board in such a matter as this, confers no authority to hear and determine a controversy in a judicial sense.'

"The foregoing language of the Supreme Court is quite clear, and further discussion seems futile, but answering categorically the first question propounded by defendants, we may say that we are of the opinion that the San Francisco charter gives the power to the board of police commissioners, sitting as trustees of the pension fund, to determine in the first instance whether or not the pensioner's disability has ceased. Such determination, however, is not judicial in character, has no legal force whatever as such, and amounts to nothing more than an indication of the board's course of action in the premises.

[2] "(2) In answering defendant's second question, we have in mind that petitioner has a vested right to retain his place upon the retired list, and to have his pension continued until his disabilities shall have ceased. Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, at page 34. One having such a vested right is entitled to a judicial determination by a court of competent jurisdiction of the facts upon which it is claimed the right has ceased.

[3, 4] "Defendants charge that petitioner defied the board, and characterize his conduct as contemptuous. Unassailed findings of the trial court show that 'the petitioner appeared before said board of police pension fund commissioners and informed and stated to said board that his disability still existed, and had not ceased, and that he objected to said board hearing or determining said matter on the ground that said board had no jurisdiction to hear or determine said matters; that he objected to being examined by any doctor, unless his own doctor, Dr. John Gallwey, was present; that he consented to being examined by Dr. Shumate, one of respondents who was a practicing physician, and that he was willing to submit to an examination at which Dr. John Gallwey was present, and wished to have Dr. Gallwey present; that except as aforesaid, he refused to submit himself for an examination.' Then followed a colloquy between petitioner and the president of the board, after which the former was excused from the hearing. There is nothing in the record showing defiance or contemptuous conduct on the part of petitioner. He simply stated and maintained, as was his privilege in the preservation of his rights, that he objected to the board hearing or determining the matter on the ground that it was without jurisdiction. Defendants' contention that petitioner must first exhaust his remedies within the police department falls with the holding in French v. Cook, supra, that 'to hold in accord with this claim in this connection would be, as we read the charter, to hold that any official authorized and required by law to do a prescribed act upon a prescribed contingency where no method is provided for the ascertainment of the facts, is invested with the power to judicially determine the facts, and that his conclusion is a judicial determination as to the facts. Such has never been declared to be the law.'

"That an attempt was made at a judicial determination of the matter by the board is shown by the following quotation from defendant's brief:

" 'The petitioner was regularly cited before the board, he was present in person, and was represented by counsel. The findings show that all the steps were regularly taken and the board found upon the evidence taken. A resolution was adopted by the board, sitting as trustees of the pension fund, and also by the board, sitting as police commissioners, so that there can be no question of the capacity in which they acted. By this resolution it was declared that the disability of petitioner had ceased, and he was ordered to report to the chief of police for active duty. Having failed to so report, he was regularly cited for insubordination, and his trial proceeded precisely as provided by the charter.'

"The findings of the trial court are quite lengthy and contain, not only a complete account of proceedings had before the police boards, but particularly detail the facts upon which the trial court based its conclusions. The trial court found, among other things, 'that petitioner has never recovered from his said injuries, incapacity, and disability since he was originally retired from said department and placed upon said pension roll, and that his physical capacity and ability to perform any service in said department as patrolman or otherwise has never improved; he has never recovered from his injuries originally sustained by him and his said disability has progressively since increased, and has never ceased and now exists and is permanent.' None of the findings are attacked, and all are supported by the evidence.

[5] "Reversal is urged upon the ground that the trial court permitted petitioner's physician to testify as to the competency of petitioner to perform police duty. The evidence shows that the physician had been attending petitioner since 1903; that petitioner was suffering from a condition affecting his nervous system and giving rise to epileptic seizures; that these attacks were directly traceable to the head injury which petitioner sustained at the time of the accident, and which occasioned his retirement. Over the objection of defendants, the trial court permitted the witness to give his opinion as to the competency of petitioner to perform police duty. The physician based his opinion upon facts personally observed by him, which facts were stated by him on his direct and cross examination. The physician witness was admittedly skilled in the science of pathology, and by reason of his knowledge in such matters, and because of the facts within his personal knowledge regarding petitioner's condition, he was able to give the trial court an opinion which might be entitled to some weight. Lemley v. Doak Gas Engine Co., 40 Cal. App. 146, 152, 180 P. 671. We do not think that defendants were prejudiced by the ruling of the trial court in admitting this evidence, for the physician's testimony was not the only evidence before the court as to petitioner's physical condition. Petitioner himself testified that the disability for which he was retired still exists, and that he has suffered from recurring epileptic seizures without warning. Defendants offered no evidence.

[6] "The cases of French v. Cook, supra, and Sheehan v. Board of Police Commissioners, supra, definitely settle the question of the powers of the defendants, when acting in a situation such as is presented by the facts of this case. Briefly stated, the law is, that the defendants, acting in any capacity, have no judicial powers; that such powers as they have are ministerial only. The writ of mandate was properly granted.

[7] "As the board was without jurisdiction to judicially determine the question as to whether or not petitioner's incapacity had ceased, it follows that the charge of insubordination was without foundation. Insubordination can rightfully be predicated only upon the refusal to obey some order, which a superior officer is entitled to give, and entitled to have obeyed. Garvin v. Chambers (Cal. Sup.) 232 P. 696."

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, it is ordered that the judgment referred to therein be, and the same is, affirmed.

1. Interpleader ⊂=35 — Interpleader in action to determine rights of parties to escrow agreement cannot recover attorney's fees.

Holder of escrow agreement, who brought action of interpleader to determine rights of parties, after their failure to agree, could not recover attorney's fees, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, attorney's fees are not expressly allowed on interpleader, and section 1021, providing that attorney's fees should be left to agreement, unless stipulated by statute, is conclusive.

2. Interpleader ⊂=35—Holder of escrow agreement cannot recover attorney's fees for action brought to determine rights of parties to agreement.

Holder of an agreement in escrow, who had to bring action to determine rights of parties thereto, after their failure to agree, could not recover attorney's fees under Civ. Code, § 2273, providing that trustee may recover necessary expenses, since section 2250 limits it to express trusts only.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action of interpleader by the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank against Shirley C. Ward and others, the Grand Avenue Company being brought in as assignee of defendant Walter H. Fisher, wherein defendants cross-complained. From a judgment for plaintiff on its interpleader, it appeals as affording insufficient relief, and from a judgment for defendant Shirley C. Ward on his cross-complaint against Walter H. Fisher and the Grand Avenue Company, they appeal, but such appeal was later dismissed. Affirmed on plaintiff's appeal.

Rehearing denied; LENNON, J., dissenting. MYERS, C. J., deeming himself disqualified, not participating.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil, W. K. Tuller, and John O'Melveny, all of Los Angeles, for appellant Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank.

Joseph Musgrove, of Los Angeles, for appellants Fisher and Grand Ave. Co.

Chandler P. Ward, of Los Angeles, for respondents Ward.

F. A. Stephenson, of Los Angeles, for respondent Gilman.

LAWLOR, Acting C. J. This is an action of interpleader. The defendant Shirley C. Ward was lessee of certain premises situated in the city of Los Angeles under a lease from the owner, Delia Gilman. The premises were sublet by said defendant to the defendant Walter H. Fisher. Subsequently, by written agreement of the two named defendants, the plaintiff was made escrow holder of a certain agreement dated August 19, 1918, entered into and executed in duplicate by them. This agreement modified in certain particulars the rights and obligations of the parties thereto in and to the premises referred to above. By the terms of the escrow agreement, the plaintiff was instructed, upon the faithful performance by defendant Walter H. Fisher of the conditions of said agreement of August 19, 1918, and of the escrow agreement executed by both parties, to deliver to said Walter H. Fisher one of such instruments and the other to the defendant Shirley C. Ward; but, should Walter H. Fisher fail to fully and faithfully perform all of the conditions and covenants of said agreements, then and in that event the plaintiff, as escrow holder, was to remove the signatures from said instruments, mark the same "Canceled" and return them to the defendant Shirley C. Ward.

Thereafter, and before any delivery of the instruments had been made, it was insisted by the defendant Shirley C. Ward that the defendant Walter H. Fisher had failed to comply with the conditions precedent to a delivery of the instrument of August 19, 1918, wherefore he demanded that said instrument be marked "Canceled" and returned to him. On the other hand, Walter H. Fisher claimed that he had fully and faithfully performed all of the conditions precedent to a delivery, and demanded delivery of the instrument in accordance with the terms of the escrow agreement. Plaintiff, being unable to determine which of the conflicting claims was the correct one, commenced this action of interpleader.

The Grand Avenue Company was brought into the action as assignee of the defendant Walter H. Fisher's interests. Plaintiff had judgment upon its complaint in interpleader against the defendants. Judgment went for Shirley C. Ward on his cross-complaint against the cross-defendants Walter H. Fisher and the Grand Avenue Company, and the appeal of the latter was later dismissed. The trial court allowed the plaintiff its court costs, but refused its prayer for attorneys' fees in the matter. Thereupon this appeal was instituted to secure an order directing the trial court to modify its judgment by allowing appellant a reasonable attorneys' fee. As stated by the appellant:

"This appeal involves only one question, namely, the right of appellant to be reimbursed for its attorneys' fees reasonably and necessarily incurred in the bringing and prosecution of this action. * * *"

Two theories are advanced by the appellant, under either of which, it is contended, it is entitled to recover the reasonable attorneys' fees in the prosecution of this action. By the first of these theories it is urged that the privileges and duties of an escrow holder are closely analogous to those of a trustee of an express trust and that, under the provisions of section 2273, Civil Code—

"A trustee is entitled to the repayment, out of the trust property, of all expenses actually and properly incurred by him in the performance of his trust. * * *"

Authorities of this and other states are cited, which contain declarations to the effect that the duties of an escrow holder resemble those of a trustee, in that the res is held for a particular purpose and is to be delivered only upon the happening of a specified act or event. It is contended that—

"These authorities are sufficient, we trust, to establish the proposition that the bank was holding as trustee of an express trust, and that therefore, by virtue of the specific statute above cited, * * * is entitled to be reimbursed for the expenses necessarily incurred by it in bringing and prosecuting this action. One of these necessary expenses was, of course, a reasonable compensation to its attorneys for the legal services necessarily performed."

The second theory of appellant suggests that—

"Entirely aside from the question whether plaintiff is entitled to this reimbursement as a technical trustee, it is so entitled under general principles."

Hereunder numerous authorities of outside jurisdictions are quoted from, wherein it is held that a plaintiff in an interpleader action is entitled to the reasonable attorneys' fees incurred therein.

By way of reply to the appellant's first theory of recovery, the respondents urge that the cases cited thereunder by appellant merely declare a similarity exists between the duties of a trustee and an escrow holder, but do not state that this similarity exists as to their respective rights. It is then contended that—

"If there be any doubt in the mind of the court that, by calling an escrow holder for hire a 'trustee,' it can recover attorneys' fees out of the funds in its hands, whether the same be incurred in performance or in violation of the terms of the trust, we submit that reference to section 1021 of the Code of Civil Procedure should eliminate this doubt. This section specifically covers the question of attorneys' fees and applies as well to trustees as to escrow holders and individuals in their private capacities."

In answer to appellant's second theory, the respondents state that—

"Attorneys' fees are not statutory 'costs' and are not recoverable as such. Brooks v. Forington, 117 Cal. 219, 221 [48 P. 1073]. They can only be recovered when provided for by contract or by statute. Civil Code [Code of Civil Procedure?] § 1021. Our statute provides for the recovery of attorneys' fees by the plaintiff in certain enumerated cases, but an action in interpleader is not named among these cases."

It is then asserted, in effect, that the existence of section 1021, Code of Civil Procedure, precludes the application of the principle announced by the authorities from other states cited by appellant.

Section 1021 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"The measure and mode of compensation of attorneys and counselors at law is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties; but parties to actions or proceedings are entitled to costs and disbursements, as hereinafter provided."

In 7 Cal. Jur., at page 286, § 27, it is said:

"The general rule is that attorney's fees are not recoverable by a successful party to an action either at law or in equity; except in the instances where they are expressly allowed by statute."

Again, in Miller v. Kehoe, 107 Cal. 340, 343, 40 P. 485, the rule is declared to be that counsel fees are not recoverable by a successful party in an action either at law or in equity, except in the enumerated instances where they are expressly allowed by statute.

Other authorities to the same effect are Williams v. MacDougall, 39 Cal. 80, 85; Bates v. County of Santa Barbara, 90 Cal. 543, 548, 27 P. 438; Salmina v. Juri, 96 Cal. 418, 420, 31 P. 365; Commercial Savings Bank v. Hornberger, 140 Cal. 16, 22, 73 P. 625; City Investment Co. v. Pringle, 49 Cal. App. 353, 355, 193 P. 504.

[1] Interpleader is not one of those actions where counsel fees are "expressly allowed by statute" (Code Civ. Proc. § 386), and, in view of the plain import of the provisions of section 1021, Code of Civil Procedure, we are of the opinion that a plaintiff in such an action is not entitled to be compensated for the attorneys' fees incurred in the prosecution thereof. In announcing this rule we are not unmindful of the numerous authorities of other jurisdictions, cited by appellant to the effect that a plaintiff in an interpleader action may recover reasonable counsel fees. It may be added, however, that there appears to be a decided conflict on this point among the authorities. But, in this state, section 1021, Code of Civil Procedure, is conclusive upon the point and expressly leaves the question of counsel fees to the agreement of the parties, where not provided for by statute.

[2] It having been determined that a plaintiff in an interpleader action is not entitled to counsel fees, it becomes necessary to decide whether or not appellant is entitled to such fees as a "trustee" within the meaning of section 2273, Civil Code.

In 10 Ruling Case Law, p. 633, § 15, it is stated that—

"In a broad sense, every depositary of an escrow is the agent of both parties. For the purpose of making delivery upon the performance of the conditions he is no less the agent of the grantee than the agent of the grantor. Strictly speaking, however, the depositary is not an agent at all, but rather the trustee of an express trust, with duties to perform for each of the parties, and which neither can forbid without the consent of the other. * * *"

The foregoing quotation is taken almost verbatim from Seibel v. Higham, 216 Mo. 121, 132, 115 S. W. 987, 990 (129 Am. St. Rep. 502), cited by appellant. An examination of that case discloses that the court had in mind, when it made the above declaration, the situation where the escrow holder is to deliver the instrument to the grantee upon the grantor's death and the court goes on to say that, if the escrow holder was said to be merely the agent of the grantor, in such a case, "his agency would cease on the grantor's death, and he would have no authority to receive the purchase money from the grantee and deliver the deed."

A similar statement is found in 10 Cal. Jur. p. 587, § 11, where it is said that—

"The duties of the depositary are those of an agent, and as such he acts for both parties to the escrow. He is, however, more than a mere agent, especially where a deed is deposited in escrow with him to be delivered to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, for, if he were merely an agent, the death of the grantor would terminate his agency and authority to deliver. By the creation of such an escrow he becomes the trustee of the grantee, with the duty of holding the deed in his possession until the death of the grantor, whereupon he must deliver it to the grantee. He likewise, as trustee for the grantor, is charged with the duty of withholding the deed from the grantee and thus preserving for the grantor a life estate in the property. If the transaction is lacking in some of the elements necessary to create a valid escrow, as, for example, where a deed has been delivered to the depositary without an agreement by the grantee to purchase and pay the purchase price, the depositary does not become the agent of the grantee but only of the grantor and as such his authority is revoked by the death of the grantor. After the creation of an escrow, the grantor may instruct the depositary to deliver the deed to the grantee upon conditions contrary to the original escrow conditions. Thereupon the depositary becomes and acts as the agent of the grantor and not as the agent of the grantee. There is nothing, however, in the status of the depositary which makes it a violation of the duties he owes to the parties to the escrow if he becomes the purchaser of the escrowed property. He then takes, of course, subject to the conditions of the escrow." (Italics added.)

It is readily apparent from each of these quotations that the escrow holder is referred to as a "trustee" only in those instances where he is to deliver a deed to the grantee upon the death of the grantor, and he is so regarded merely to preclude the termination of his authority upon the grantor's death; in all other cases an escrow holder is referred to as the "agent" of the parties. This reasoning would also apply to Estate of Cornelius, 151 Cal. 550, 552, 91 P. 329, 330, cited by appellant, where it is declared:

"Upon the facts stated, the deed became an executed conveyance upon the delivery to Bartholomew for the grantees. He was thereafter holding for them as their trustee, and for the grantor as her trustee. His duty to her was to withhold it from the grantees during her lifetime, and thus preserve to her, in effect, a life estate in the property. His duty to the grantees was to hold the deed in his possession until her death and then deliver it to them. * * *"

Here again the escrow holder is referred to as a "trustee," so that his authority may be held to survive the death of the grantor and thus validate a subsequent delivery to the grantee. However, it cannot be said that this case is authority for the proposition that an escrow holder is a "trustee" in any sense other than to make delivery after the death of the grantor, notwithstanding that in many instances the terms "agent" and "trustee" are used interchangeably. Though, as indicated, an escrow holder has at times been referred to as a "trustee," in most instances he is looked upon as the mere agent of the parties. In 21 Cor. Jur. p. 878, § 24, it is stated:

"Until the escrow contract has been made, the depositary has no rights or authority enforceable at law, but, when it has been made and the instrument deposited, he becomes the agent of both parties, and the death of a party prior to the performance of the condition does not affect the depositary's obligation to perform the duties imposed upon him by the escrow contract. When the condition upon which the instrument is to take effect is performed, the depositary becomes a mere agent or trustee of the grantee and his possession is equivalent to possession by the grantee." (Italics added.)

It is apparent from this quotation that an escrow holder is regarded as an "agent," and that he is called a "trustee" only where the condition has been performed; the grantee then being entitled to delivery, the capacity of the escrow holder is, in effect, changed, and he becomes a trustee of the instrument for the grantee.

Therefore, conceding that there may be some similarity between the duties of an escrow holder and those of a trustee, nevertheless, we do not think this would render applicable the provisions of section 2273, Civil Code, wherein it is declared:

"A trustee is entitled to the repayment, out of the trust property, of all expenses actually and properly incurred by him in the performance of his trust. He is entitled to the repayment of even unlawful expenditures, if they were productive of actual benefit of the estate."

This section, it is true, lays down the rule of law applicable to trustees generally, but, in our opinion, section 2250, Civil Code, being a part of the same chapter as section 2273, confines the rule to express trustees. Section 2250 reads:

"The provisions of this chapter apply only to express trusts, created for the benefit of another than the trustor, and in which the title to the trust property is vested in the trustee; not including, however, those of executors, administrators, and guardians, as such."

It cannot be maintained that an escrow holder is an express trustee within the meaning of the provisions of these sections of the Civil Code. It would seem that he is designated as a "trustee" for purposes of convenience to avoid a lapse of his authority upon the death of the grantor.

Having concluded that an escrow holder is not an "express trustee" within the meaning of that term as found in sections 2250 and 2273, Civil Code, it becomes unnecessary to consider the case of Mitau v. Roddan, 149 Cal. 1, 84 P. 145, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 275, wherein it is held that a trustee is entitled to reimbursement for counsel fees necessarily expended in the conduct of an action properly brought.

Our conclusion also renders unnecessary any discussion of respondents' contention that—

"The record is utterly destitute of proof of the reasonable value of the services rendered by the appellant, as well as the nature and extent of the services and the time devoted thereto."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

(S. F. 11569.)

1. New trial ⊜116(2)—Statute fixing time when power of court to pass on motion for new trial shall expire construed.

In view of the history and mode of enactment of Code Civ. Proc. § 660, providing that power of court to pass on motion for new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of jury or service on the moving party of notice of entry of judgment, held that the intent of the Legislature was that the definite act of service of notice of entry of judgment on opposing party was required to fix the time when power of court to pass upon motion should begin to run.

2. Exceptions, bill of ⊜41(5)—As affecting time for filing bill of exceptions, service of notice of entry of judgment required to start time running within which trial court could pass on motion for new trial.

Where defendant filed motion for new trial, but no service of notice of entry of judgment was served on defendant, the time within which trial court was required to pass on the motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 660, did not begin to run until notice was actually served as affecting time for filing bill of exceptions provided by section 650, waiver not being enough.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by William Strehlow and others against Pressley Mothorn. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Motion by plaintiff to strike bill of exceptions from transcript. Motion denied.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. W. Hollingsworth and W. F. Cowan, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiffs and respondents move the court for an order striking out the bill of exceptions contained in the transcript on appeal herein upon the ground that it was served and presented for settlement to the trial court too late. The record herein discloses that this was an action for an injunction with damages; that the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the trial court were filed on September 5, 1922, and that the judgment of said court based thereon was also filed and entered on that day; that no notice of the entry of said judgment was ever served upon the defendant. On September 13, 1922, the defendant applied to the trial court for and obtained an order staying execution. On September 14, 1922, the defendant served his notice of intention to move for a new trial. On September 18, 1922, he served upon the plaintiff and filed his notice of appeal from the judgment wherein he recited that he "appeals to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the final judgment in said action given in favor of the plaintiffs and against said defendant, entered on the 5th day of September, 1922, and from the whole of said final judgment." On May 7, 1923, the trial court made and entered its formal order after a hearing thereon denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. Thereafter the defendant obtained by order of court or by stipulation between the parties additional time within which to prepare and serve his bill of exceptions, in each of which stipulations, however, the plaintiffs through their counsel stated that they objected, and at all times would object, to the settlement or allowance of any bill of exceptions to be used by the defendant on his appeal from the judgment, upon the ground that the same were not presented within the time limited by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiffs also, and on October 18, 1923, served upon the defendant and filed with the court a notice of their said objection in the same words and effect; and also in proposing their amendments to the defendant's proposed bill of exceptions reserved the same objection; and they also, upon the hearing upon and settlement of said bill of exceptions, made and reserved the same objection. The trial court, however, overruled said objection and allowed and settled said bill of exceptions and the same as thus allowed and settled became with the said several objections thereto a part of the transcript on appeal thereafter prepared and filed herein.

The basis of the motion of plaintiffs and respondents to have said bill of exceptions stricken from the files and disregarded upon this appeal is this: That the defendant, by his act in moving for and obtaining from the trial court on September 13, 1922, an order "that execution upon the judgment herein be stayed five days from the date hereof," and also by his action in serving and filing on September 18, 1922, his notice of appeal to this court "from the final judgment in said action * * * entered on the 5th day of September, 1922, and from the whole of said final judgment," had thereby waived notice of entry of said judgment; that by virtue of such waiver thus appearing upon the records and files of said trial court no other or further notice of the entry of said judgment was required to be served upon the defendant in order to set in motion the running of the statutory time within which, under section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the said defendant must have prepared and served his bill of exceptions, and also the time within which, under section 660 of the same Code, the trial court must have determined the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The respondent cites numerous cases wherein it has been decided that the party to an action desiring to move for a new trial or take an appeal may waive his statutory right to notice of the decision or of the entry of judgment by doing some act which caused it to appear upon the records and files of the trial court that such party had actual knowledge of the fact of the filing of the decision of the court or of the entry of its judgment, and that in such cases formal and written notice of the court's action was not necessary to be served upon such party in order to start the running of the time within which he must exercise his statutory rights in presenting his motion for a new trial or to take and present a record upon appeal. As, for example, it has been held by this court in the case of Gardner v. Stare, 135 Cal. 118, 67 P. 5, that a party by applying to the court for and by obtaining a stay of execution upon the judgment thereby waived his right under section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure to receive the "notice of decision" provided for in said section of the Code. In the case of Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 P. 611, it was held upon the authority of Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 113, 110 P. 109, that the filing of a notice of appeal from a judgment or order is conclusive evidence that the appellant knew of such judgment or order so as to set in motion the time within which he must give the notice to the clerk for the preparation of the transcript required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. In the case of Hughes v. De Mund (Cal. Sup.) 233 P. 94, it was held that the service and filing by a defendant of a notice of appeal from a judgment dispensed with necessity of the notice of entry of judgment or, in case of a pending motion for a new trial, of the notice of decision denying said motion so as to set the time running within which the party otherwise entitled to such notices under section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure must prepare and serve his bill of exceptions. The foregoing decisions rest upon a long line of earlier cases to the same effect. It is to be observed, however, that the question presented by this motion is not as to whether the appellant herein, by his affirmative action in applying for a stay of execution or in serving and filing his notice of appeal from the judgment, has waived his statutory right to notice of the entry of said judgment, but the question here presented is as to when the power of the superior court to pass upon the motion for a new trial herein expired under the provisions of the closing clause of section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which now reads as follows:

"The power of the court to pass on motion for new trial shall expire within two months after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the entry of the judgment. If such motion is not determined within said two months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court."

[1] The foregoing limitations upon the power of trial courts in the matter of considering and disposing of motions for new trial were added to said section of the Code by the Legislature of 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 202. The section as then amended provided for a period of three months "after the verdict of the jury or service on the moving party of notice of the decision of the court" within which the power of the court must be exercised in passing upon the motion for a new trial; and it was further therein provided that "if such motion is not determined within said three months, the effect shall be a denial of the motion without further order of the court." In the case of Moore v. Strayer, 175 Cal. 171, 165 P. 530, the interpretation of the foregoing amendment to section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure came directly before this court in a case wherein it was contended upon motion to dismiss an appeal that the appellants, by serving and filing their notice of intention to move for a new trial, without waiting for service of notice of the decision of the court, had thereby set in motion the running of the time within which the trial court had power to determine said motion, and that said motion, not having been determined by the court within said time, had been denied by operation of law upon a date more than 30 days prior to the filing of the notice of appeal. This court, however, rejected this contention, and in so doing laid emphasis upon the language of said amendment to the section requiring "service on the moving party of notice of the decision of the court." In so doing this court proceeded to say:

"If the rights of the party appealing were alone to be considered, the giving of the notice of intention might, as to him, be construed as a waiver of service of notice of decision, but the provision relates to the power of the court, jurisdiction of which to pass upon the motion is divested only by the service of notice of decision followed by the lapse of a period of three months, during which it is empowered to act on the motion for a new trial."

[2] The Legislature of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 240) amended the foregoing amendment to said section by substituting the words "notice of the entry of the judgment" in place of the words "notice of the decision of the court," and the Legislature of 1923 (Stats. 1923, p. 233) further amended the same by shortening the time within which the power of the trial court to pass upon motions for new trial must be exercised from "three months" to two months. In making said latter amendment the Legislature re-enacted the section with the interpretation which this court had theretofore placed upon it. If a reason is to be sought for the employment by the Legislature of the explicit language of its first amendment to section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure made in 1915, designating "service of notice of the decision," and of its later amendment thereto requiring "service of notice of the entry of judgment" as the definite act which should fix the date when the power of the court to pass upon a motion for a new trial should begin to run and also the date when such power should terminate, it might be found in the apparent desire of the framers of both amendments to do away with all uncertainty as to the power and jurisdiction of trial courts in the premises. However this may be, we are constrained to hold that the intent of the Legislature, as expressed in the explicit terms of the statute, must be given effect. In the absence from the record in the instant case of any showing of service of notice of the entry of judgment, the time within which the trial court was required to pass upon the motion for a new trial had not begun to run at the time of the submission of said motion for a new trial, and had not expired, when, on May 7, 1923, the court made and entered its order denying the same. It is conceded that, if the respondents' said objection was not well taken the appellant within the time allowed by law, by the order of court and by the stipulation of the parties, prepared and presented his bill of exceptions which is now sought to be stricken from the transcript on appeal. It follows that the reiterated objections of the respondents to the presentation and settlement of said bill of exceptions were without avail, and that their present motion to strike out the same must be denied. It is so ordered.

DE MATEI et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LAKE COUNTY et al.
(Civ. 3006.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 20, 1925. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 19, 1925.)

1. Certiorari ⟹29—Mere error in decision of court having jurisdiction not reviewable.

A court having lawful cognizance of a case, its decision, even if erroneous, is within its jurisdiction, and so is not reviewable by certiorari, a writ going only to the question of jurisdiction.

2. Certiorari ⟹28(2)—Appeal by defendants from default judgment of justice gave superior court jurisdiction of them.

Even if justice court had not acquired jurisdiction of defendants, they, by taking appeal from default judgment of the justice to superior court, submitted themselves to jurisdiction of superior court, so that its decision of affirmance was not without jurisdiction, relative to review by certiorari.

3. Certiorari ⟹64(2)—Attack on jurisdiction confined to that of court to which writ is directed, though its decision was on appeal.

On certiorari to annul judgment of superior court affirming on appeal justice's default judgment, attack on jurisdiction over defendants cannot extend to the justice court, but must be limited to the superior court; and this irrespective of whether defendants' appearance in justice court was general or special.

Petition by Thomas De Matei and another for writ of review to the Superior Court in and for Lake County, M. S. Sayre, Judge, to annul a judgment of affirmance on appeal from justice's court. Peremptory writ denied.

Joseph C. Meyerstein and Frank P. Webster, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for respondents.

HART, J. Application for a writ of review to have annulled and set aside a certain judgment of the respondent court affirming the judgment of the justice's court of township No. 4, in the county of Lake, in favor of C. E. Colwell and against the petitioners and one George A. Disselmeyer, in an action in which the first named was plaintiff and the three last named were defendants. Some of the proceedings which took place in the said justice's court in said action and those which took place in the respondent court are accurately set forth in the petition filed herein as follows:

"On the 27th day of January, 1925, one C. E. Colwell filed in the justice's court of No. 4 township, county of Lake, a complaint against your petitioners and one George A. Disselmeyer for goods sold and delivered. A copy of said complaint and summons issued thereon were served on one of your petitioners on the 2d day of February, 1925, at the city and county of San Francisco, state of California. The complaint contained no allegation that any of the defendants were residents of the county of Lake, at any time, nor that the defendants, or either of them, contracted in writing to perform an obligation at a particular place (Lake county). In due time your petitioner specially appeared in the said justice's court by motion, supported by an affidavit, for the sole purpose of quashing the service of the summons upon your petitioners, for the reason that your petitioners have not at any time resided in the county of Lake, and that said action was not one brought against defendants who have contracted in writing to perform an obligation at a particular place, and that therefore the court had no jurisdiction of the person of these defendants. The justice's court denied the motion, and, your petitioners declining to proceed further, judgment by default was entered against them. From said judgment, in due time, your petitioners presented their appeal to the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Lake, upon questions of law. The superior court of the county of Lake affirmed the said judgment of the justice's court."

The petitioners here claim, as they allege in their petition, that, in affirming the judgment of the said justice's court in said action, the respondent court acted in excess of its jurisdiction.

The plaintiff in said action, C. E. Colwell, filed and noticed a motion to dismiss the appeal on the ground, among others, that the purported undertaking on appeal was insufficient to support the appeal.

The learned trial judge, in a written opinion, which is incorporated into and brought up with the record constituting the return to the order to show cause issued herein by this court, declared that, while the point that the undertaking was in law wholly insufficient as such an instrument was well taken, he preferred to review and dispose of the appeal on its merits, and so affirmed the judgment upon the theory and the conclusion that it sufficiently appeared upon the face of the record in the action that the defendant Disselmeyer, at the time the action was brought and service of process was made upon him, was a resident of the county of Lake.

The specific contention of the petitioners is that the justice's court from which the appeal was taken did not obtain jurisdiction of their persons, and that, inasmuch as such jurisdiction is not made affirmatively to appear by or from the proceedings before said court, and that such jurisdiction in the justice's court cannot be presumed, since the rule is that no presumption can be indulged in favor or support of such jurisdiction, there was upon the record no other alternative left to the respondent court but to reverse the judgment.

[1] Admittedly the justice's court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and it is equally true that if the respondent court acquired jurisdiction of the appeal any errors which it might have committed in disposing thereof cannot be reviewed through or by means of a jurisdictional writ. This is elementary. As the cases put the proposition, when a tribunal or board exercising judicial functions has lawful cognizance of a case or proceeding, it has the jurisdiction (not the right, as it has been carelessly stated), to make error as well as not to do so. This statement simply means that, as above stated, error thus committed is not subject to review by a higher court through the agency of a writ whose sole and only purpose is to determine the question whether the judicial act done and objected to was within the lawful jurisdiction of the tribunal to do.

[2] In the present case, even if, in point of fact, it be true, as is the claim, that the justice's court never acquired jurisdiction of the persons of the petitioners, the latter certainly submitted themselves or their persons to the jurisdiction of the respondent court by the very act of taking the appeal from the judgment of the justice's court. If this were not true, there would be presented the very novel and, indeed, absurd, situation in which the superior court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction in the case, would be limited to the doing of one or two things, viz.: Reverse the judgment or dismiss the action. In truth, the necessary assumption of the petitioners herein is that the superior court has jurisdiction to reverse the judgment, but is without jurisdiction to affirm it, the practical effect of which position is that, in such a situation as is presented here, the appellant would have it in his power to control the discretion of the superior court in the decision of the appeal. Or, as one of our cases has well interpreted a like position taken by the appellant on an appeal from the justice's court to the superior court, he thus was asking the Supreme Court to restrain the superior court "from trying (and determining) the appeal which he was prosecuting." Sanborn v. Superior Court, 60 Cal. 425.

[3] But it is well settled, at least in this state, that the writ of certiorari will not lie "to review the judgment of a justice's court after appeal taken and determined in the Superior Court." Olcese v. Superior Court, 156 Cal. 82, 86, 103 P. 317. In that case, an attempt was made to have reviewed by certiorari a judgment of the superior court affirming the judgment of the justice's court in an action sounding in contract, in which the complaint failed to show that the contract was not in writing, the contention being that the petitioner, who was a resident of a county other than that in which the action was brought, could not legally be served with summons unless the contract was shown to be in writing, and that, for that reason, the justice's court never acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant. The Supreme Court gave an extended consideration to the question whether the writ of review may be used for the purpose of reviewing a judgment of a justice's court after an appeal to and the determination thereof by the superior court by directing the writ to the latter court. It was held therein that the defendant in the justice's court, by taking an appeal to the superior court, submitted his person to the jurisdiction of said court; that said court, being one of general jurisdiction and empowered to pass upon the law and the facts of the case, its determination thereof was res adjudicata and operated as an estoppel. It is further stated in that case that an appeal from a justice's court is tantamount to a writ of error, and that to sanction the review of the decision of the superior court on the appeal would in effect amount to the entertainment of a second writ of error aimed at the judgment of the justice's court, a procedure which is, of course, not allowable. See, also, American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, 164 Cal. 327, 128 P. 921; Albers v. Superior Court, 30 Cal. App. 772, 775, 159 P. 453; Bogmuda v. Young, 58 Cal. App. 19, 207 P. 915. Attention, however, is called to a distinction between the case of Olcese v. Superior Court and the present case in this: That in the former the appearance of the defendant in the justice's court was general, while in the present case the appearance of the defendants in the justice's court was special, or for the single purpose of challenging the authority of said court to proceed with the hearing of the case, or to attempt to entertain jurisdiction thereof on the ground that it (justice's court) had never acquired jurisdiction of their persons. But this distinction does not in the slightest degree detract from the force of the proposition that, in taking the appeal, the petitioners as effectually submitted themselves or their persons to the jurisdiction of the superior court as if they had made a general appearance in the justice's court. In fact, as before stated, by taking the appeal they, in effect, asked the superior court, in the exercise of its appellate jurisdiction in said case, to relieve them from the effect of what they regarded as an illegal usurpation by the justice's court of jurisdiction of their persons, and, in doing this, they, by the very logic of the situation, submitted themselves to the lawful cognizance of said court for all the essential purposes of the appeal. But the identical point has previously been made and the validity thereof denied. In American Law Book Co. v. Superior Court, supra, the point now in hand, as well as others pertinent to the consideration of the ultimate question submitted for decision herein, is interestingly discussed and disposed of. We refer to that case and others cited in the opinion as decisive of the point adversely to the position of the petitioners thereon.

The order to show cause is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ denied.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Aug. 21, 1925.)

Prohibition ⟸3(3)—District Court of Appeal will not issue original writ, where superior court had denied writ.

Where petitioner applied in superior court, for writ of prohibition directed to board of trustees of municipality to prevent them from calling a recall election, and writ was denied, District Court of Appeal will not issue it on a duplicate petition filed therein to invoke its original jurisdiction in such matter, as Court of Appeal had appellate jurisdiction of denial of writ if it had been invoked.

Application for writ of prohibition by George W. Ogden, against the Board of Trustees of the City of Colton and others. Writ denied.

See, also, 239 P. 855.

D. A. Rothrock, of Colton, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. By petition filed herein on the 18th day of August, 1925, petitioner applied for a writ of prohibition, to be directed to the board of trustees of the city of Colton and the members of said board, to prevent them from calling a recall election against petitioner and Walter H. Evans as members of said board of trustees.

It was alleged by petitioner that, by reason of certain defects in the recall petition, and by reason of certain other matters in connection therewith, the board was without jurisdiction to call or hold such recall election, but that nevertheless the said board, unless prohibited from so doing, would, at its meeting on the evening of August 19, 1925, proceed to call said recall election.

It was further stated in the petition that on August 17, 1925, the petitioner presented to the superior court in and for the county of San Bernardino a petition similar in form and substance to the petition herein, but that said court denied said petition.

The petition herein having been presented by counsel for petitioner and considered by the court, an order was made on August 19, 1925, denying the application. By reason of the necessity for an immediate disposition of the matter, the order was made in advance of a written opinion or statement of grounds of the decision. In conformity with the desire of counsel, we make that statement now.

It is a long-established rule that, where a proceeding of this nature has been instituted in a superior court and the writ denied, this court will not issue the writ on a duplicate petition filed here for the purpose of invoking the original jurisdiction of this court in such matter.

"Under the Constitution of this state, this court has appellate jurisdiction in prohibition, and, while it also has original jurisdiction in such proceedings, it will not exercise the same where the petitioner possesses the right of appeal from a judgment had in the court where the original proceeding was commenced." Matter of Application of Burt for Writ of Prohibition, 17 Cal. App. 309, 119 P. 674; Wood v. Board of Fire Commissioners, 50 Cal. App. 593, 195 P. 739.

It is contrary to the policy of the law and to the principles of orderly procedure, that a party who has invoked the jurisdiction of one court and who has a right of appeal to a higher court, should be permitted to substitute for such appeal a second and like application to the higher court as a court of original jurisdiction. If such repeated applications were recognized, it would follow, on the same principle, that, on denial of the application made to this court, the dissatisfied petitioner could immediately be permitted to apply to the Supreme Court and perhaps obtain from that court the original writ which he desires, instead of applying to the Supreme Court in due course for a rehearing of this present proceeding. We think that it is not to be permitted that a litigant should thus experiment with the several courts in respect to their concurrent original jurisdiction.

In view of the opinion held by us on the point above stated, the petition was denied without regard to its possible merits in other respects.

Certiorari ⟸25—Held not to lie to annul certificate of city clerk certifying to sufficiency of petition for recall election.

Certiorari as writ of review held not to lie to annul a certificate made by city clerk certifying to sufficiency of petition, under Deering's Gen. Laws (1923 Ed.) Act 5620, approved Jan. 2, 1912, for recall of members of city board of trustees, since act of clerk is not judicial in character.

Application for writ of certiorari by George W. Ogden against the Board of Trustees of the City of Colton and others. Writ denied.

D. A. Rothrock, of Colton, for petitioner.

CONREY, P. J. This is an application for a writ of certiorari, whereby petitioner seeks to annul a certificate made by the city clerk of the city of Colton, certifying to the sufficiency of a petition for the recall of George W. Ogden and Walter H. Evans as members of the board of trustees of said city, which city is a municipal corporation of the sixth class. The parties to this proceeding are identical with those named in Civil No. 5175, 239 P. 855, except that the city clerk is named as an additional party herein. The petitioner in No. 5175 applied for a writ of prohibition to prevent the board of trustees from calling the proposed recall election. It was alleged in both petitions that, unless prevented by order of this court, the board of trustees, at its meeting on August 19, 1925, would proceed to call said recall election.

In said case No. 5175, this court, on the morning of August 19th, denied the petition, for reasons which appear in the opinion in that case this day filed. Thereupon, and on the same day, the petitioner filed his petition for writ of certiorari to be issued herein, and thereby sought to obtain, not only a review of the certificate made by the city clerk, but incidentally to obtain forthwith, as a part of said writ of review, an order restraining the board of trustees from proceeding with the recall election. The urgency for immediate action on the petition was such that, in compliance with the desire of the applicant for immediate action, we made our order herein on that day. The petition was denied. In accordance with our assurance to counsel at that time, we make this statement of the case and of the grounds of decision:

The first ten paragraphs of the petition herein are identical with the petition for prohibition in said case No. 5175. The additional paragraphs 11 and 12 in some respects differ from the other petition. In so far as the facts alleged in the present petition apply only to the question of the right to a writ of prohibition, we consider them governed by our disposition of said case No. 5175. It is only necessary to deal with this petition as one praying for a writ of review, to be directed to the city clerk for the purpose of determining whether he has exceeded his jurisdiction in the exercise of some function of a judicial nature.

Proceedings for the recall of municipal officers are directly authorized and defined by "An act to provide for the recall of elective officers of incorporated cities and towns," approved January 2, 1912. Deering's Gen. Laws (1923 Ed.) Act 5620.

In Wright v. Engram, 186 Cal. 659, 201 P. 788, the Supreme Court had before it an application for a writ of certiorari to review the action of the defendant as city clerk of the city of Redding, in determining that a petition filed in the office of said clerk for the recall of certain trustees of said city was sufficient to authorize a recall election as provided in the same statute under which the present recall proceedings have been instituted. The court held that the action required of the clerk by that act is not judicial in character, and that consequently certiorari would not lie to review his decision. Upon that sole ground the application for the writ was denied. With that definite authority before us, we could not do otherwise than deny the petition for a like writ in this case.

Where party is dissatisfied with costs taxed on appeal reversing judgment, he is entitled to remedy for review of order taxing same, as provided in Code Civ. Proc. § 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Joseph Markart against Irving S. Zeimer and another. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed. On motion to dismiss appeal from order denying motion to strike out costs on appeal. Motion denied.

Sawyer & Sawyer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George F. McNoble, of Stockton, and Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. Motion to dismiss appeal from a certain order made by the court below.

The plaintiff sued the defendants, who are physicians and surgeons, for damages for injuries alleged to have been directly produced by their negligence, while they were engaged in the performance of a surgical operation upon his person. The cause was tried by a jury, and verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff followed. In due time, defendants took an appeal from said judgment, and subsequently said appeal was heard and considered by this court, with the result that the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded to the court below for a new trial. Markart v. Zeimer & Heppner (Cal. App.) 227 P. 683. The remittitur therein, having been, in due legal time, transmitted by the clerk of this court to the clerk of the court below, was duly filed in the office of the county clerk of the county of San Joaquin, on the 19th day of July, 1924. Thereafter, and on the 16th day of August, 1924, the defendants caused to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court below a memorandum of their costs and disbursements on appeal in said action; that, on said 16th day of August, 1924, notice of the filing of said memorandum or bill of costs and disbursements was served on the counsel for the plaintiff, in the city and county of San Francisco, and on said 16th day of August said counsel for plaintiff, in writing, accepted service of said notice.

On the 29th day of August, 1924, the counsel for the plaintiff served notice on defendants or their counsel, to the effect that, on Monday, the 8th day of September, 1924, at 1:30 p. m. of said day, they would move the court below "for an order striking out and from the files of this court defendants' memorandum of costs on appeal on file herein," on several different specified grounds. This notice of said motion was answered by the defendants by denials and certain affirmative allegations, and a prayer for a settlement of defendants' bill of costs as filed on the date above stated. As above stated, the motion was denied. The ground of the motion to dismiss this appeal is that the order from which the appeal purports to have been taken is not one of the special orders made after final judgment from which section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an appeal will lie, inasmuch as (so the contention is) a judgment of an appellate court affirming, reversing, or modifying a judgment is not a final judgment, within the meaning of said section, which section, among other things, provides that an appeal may be taken from any special order made after final judgment.

Section 1027 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the prevailing party, on appeal, is entitled to his costs excepting when the judgment is modified. See, also, rule 23, Supreme and Appellate Courts. In this case, as seen, the judgment of the Appellate Court involved a straight reversal—that is to say, the judgment appealed from was not modified.

The proceeding in which the order from which the present appeal is taken is founded upon the provisions of section 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"Whenever costs are awarded to a party by an appellate court, if he claims such costs, he must, within thirty days after the remittitur is filed with the clerk below, deliver to such clerk and serve upon the adverse party a memorandum of his costs, verified as prescribed by the preceding section. The party dissatisfied with the costs claimed may move to have the same taxed in the same manner and within a like time after notice of filing of the bill of costs, as prescribed by the preceding section. After such costs have been taxed, or the time for taxing the same has expired, execution may issue therefor as upon a judgment."

[1] It is not contended that the judgment of a court of review affirming, reversing, or modifying a judgment on appeal from a judgment of the superior court is not a final judgment. Indeed, no such contention or claim could logically be urged, for, obviously, a judgment by such court is final in the strictest sense, and this is true, of course, whether the judgment appealed from and affirmed, reversed, or modified, be a final judgment or only an interlocutory judgment or decree. The contention is, as we have seen, that the judgment of a court of review is not the "final judgment" referred to by section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that from any special order made after "final judgment" an appeal will lie, and that, therefore, in order that he may have the action of the trial court refusing to strike from the files the defendants' memorandum of costs on appeal reviewed, the plaintiff must do so by an appeal from some judgment in the case.

[2] It is settled that an order on a motion to retax a cost bill, made after the rendition of a final judgment by the superior court, is appealable. It was recently so declared by the Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Seawell, in Hennessy v. Superior Court, etc., 194 Cal. 368, 228 P. 862, citing Dooly v. Norton, 41 Cal. 439; Empire Gold Min. Co. v. Bonanza, etc., Min. Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 P. 810; Yorba v. Dobner, 90 Cal. 337, 27 P. 185; Linforth v. S. F. Gas, etc., Co., 9 Cal. App. 434, 99 P. 716; Quitzow v. Perrin, 120 Cal. 255, 52 P. 632; Elledge v. Superior Court, 131 Cal. 279, 63 P. 360. It may be suggested that, while it is true that the order from which the appeal here is taken is not, strictly speaking, based on a motion to tax costs, but is founded on a motion to strike the cost bill from the files, yet, in its general purpose and effect, it amounts to the same thing. In fact, the application upon which the order appealed from herein is based has been treated as amounting to the same proceeding as a motion to tax or retax costs. See Stafford v. Hill, 63 Cal. App. 15, 217 P. 766, and Arrow Garage Co. v. Kikugawa (Cal. App.) 231 P. 571. The position of the movent herein, however, is based principally on the opinion in the case of In re Kling, 48 Cal. App. 741, 192 P. 453. In that case the order appealed from was founded on an application to retax, strike out, and disallow the respondent's bill for costs on appeal, the proceeding to retax and disallow having evidently been inaugurated under the provisions of section 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra. It is said in the Kling Case:

"To entitle a party to appeal directly from an order of this character, it must, as provided by section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, appear that the same was made after final judgment rendered in the case wherein allowance of costs is sought. Crane v. Forth, 95 Cal. 88, 30 P. 193; Empire Co. v. Bonanza Co., 67 Cal. 406, 7 P. 810. As stated, the judgment of disbarment was, on appeal, reversed for insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings implied therein. The effect of such reversal was to remand the case for a new trial. Ryan v. Tomlinson, 39 Cal. 639; Falkner v. Hendy, 107 Cal. 49, 40 P. 21, 386. By such action the parties, until a new trial was had or other disposition made of the case, were in precisely the same position as if a trial thereof had never been had. Sharp v. Miller, 66 Cal. 98, 4 P. 1065. Hence, for the reason that at the time of the making of the order no final judgment had been rendered in the case, the order is not appealable. A review thereof can be had only upon an appeal from the judgment. Lasky v. Davis, 33 Cal. 677; Stevenson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 105, 87 Am. Dec. 107; Empire Co. v. Bonanza Co., supra."

[3, 4] It will be noticed that the court in the Kling Case makes no reference to section 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is highly probable that that section was not called to the attention of the court in that case. At all events, however, we cannot agree with the conclusion announced in said case. We have not been able to persuade ourselves that it harmonizes either with the language or the intent of section 1034 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The proceeding for the taxing of costs involves a matter growing out of, but collateral or ancillary to, the particular judgment in the procurement of which in the action in which the judgment is rendered such costs are incurred. It is true that the costs incurred by reason of the action and the trial thereof may become a part of the judgment rendered therein, and in such case the matter of the taxing of the costs is reviewable on an appeal from such judgment, but this does not mean that it may not be reviewed on appeal from the order taxing or disallowing the costs. Conceivable contingencies preventing a review of such order on an appeal from the judgment might arise. For instance, it might happen that the court, either for proper or erroneous reasons, may refuse to entertain the application for the taxing of costs, until after the appeal from the judgment has been taken, or circumstances might exist which would justify delay in determining the motion, until after an appeal had been taken from the judgment. In either case, it could not reasonably be contended that an appeal from the order taxing such costs would not lie.

The case of Hennessy v. Superior Court, supra, is very similar to the one first supposed, and, as stated above, the Supreme Court held that the order taxing or refusing to tax costs was appealable as a special order made after final judgment within the meaning and intent of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As pointed out, and as is obvious, the matter of taxing costs involves a proceeding ancillary to the particular judgment in the securing of which such costs have been incurred, and, while it is true that costs allowed on appeal to the prevailing party on appeal are an essential part of the judgment on appeal, it certainly would not for a moment be supposed that, to obtain a review of the action of the court in taxing costs on appeal, an appeal from the judgment on appeal would lie. Nor would the order be reviewable upon an appeal from any judgment which might be rendered on a retrial of the case for the obvious reason that such costs would have no more relation to, or connection with, a judgment so obtained than they would have to a judgment rendered in an action between different parties or involving different issues. Besides, it might happen that plaintiff, on a retrial, would again obtain judgment against the defendants, and in such case, if the position of the movant were well founded, the party entitled to such costs would suffer a denial of the right to have the order reviewed at all. None of these obviously absurd propositions is made, even impliedly, by the learned counsel, nor are they suggested or hinted at in the Kling Case, the opinion in which was written by a jurist of recognized ability. They are only suggested here to illustrate the proposition that an appeal from an order taxing costs on appeal and allowed by the Appellate Court would wholly be denied to an aggrieved party dissatisfied with the taxing of such costs, if it were necessary to hold that a judgment of the Appellate Court was not a final judgment within the meaning or intent of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But, after all, upon the Code sections themselves may the determination of the controversy rest.

Section 963 does not expressly restrict its operation as to appeals from special orders after final judgments to those made after final judgments of the superior court. The language in that particular is general and reasonably applicable to any special order made after the rendition of any final judgment, and, as we have before suggested, and as is plainly true, a judgment by an appellate court in any case cannot be viewed as anything other than a final judgment. It will be noted that section 1034 fixes the time from the date of the filing of the remittitur in the office of the clerk of the court below within which the prevailing party on appeal must file his memorandum of costs on appeal at 30 days, and provides that, after such costs are ascertained and determined or have been taxed, or the time for taxing the same has expired, execution may issue therefor as upon a judgment. It further provides that the party dissatisfied with the costs claimed may move to have the same taxed in the same manner and within a like time after notice of filing of the bill of costs, "as prescribed by the preceding section" (1033), which applies to the matter of costs incurred in the trial of the action. There can be no doubt that the last-mentioned provisions of section 1034 themselves clearly indicate that it was the legislative intent that the party dissatisfied with such costs, as taxed, should be entitled to a remedy for a review of the order taxing the same as provided by section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The motion to dismiss is denied.

In re STUHLDREHER'S ESTATE.

LEMON et al. v. STUHLDREHER.

(Civ. 5186.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 26, 1925.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟹283—Refusal of court to order part payment of claims against estate or determine priorities was within its discretion.

Where it was shown to the court that liquidated assets of estate were not sufficient to pay all claims, but there were unliquidated assets of speculative and uncertain value, it was not an abuse of discretion to refuse to determine, before all the assets were marshaled, whether personal injury judgment was a preferred claim or to make part payment of claims.

2. Stipulations ⟹3—Stipulation of counsel to permit court to determine priorities of claim and make part payment is of no effect.

Filing of a stipulation by counsel for estate and claimant, permitting court to determine priority of claim and to make partial payment of claims, is of no effect, since power of court is determined by statute, and cannot be increased or decreased by stipulation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Jack Stuhldreher, deceased. Application by Blanche E. Lemon and another against Esther M. Stuhldreher, administratrix of the estate of Jack Stuhldreher, deceased, to have judgment declared preferred claim. From an order denying the application, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Fred A. Shaeffer, of Santa Maria, for appellants.

A. B. Bigler, of Santa Maria, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. On August 26, 1920, Harland B. Lemon was employed by Jack Stuhldreher in his vulcanizing shop at Santa Maria, Cal. A gasoline explosion occurred, which set fire to the shop and burned the employee and his employer. The employee died of his injuries on the same day. The employer died the next day. Such proceedings were had that Esther M. Stuhldreher, the wife of the employer, was duly appointed administratrix of his estate. Blanche E. Lemon, the surviving wife of the employee, took such proceedings that the Industrial Accident Commission thereafter made its findings and award in favor of the surviving wife and Harland B. Lemon, her minor child, in the sum of $4,495.50. A certified copy of said award was filed with the county clerk of Santa Barbara county, and a judgment was entered thereon. On proceedings duly had and taken, the Industrial Accident Commission converted said award into a lump sum, $4,058.34, payable forthwith. A certified copy of its order was filed with the county clerk, and a judgment in accordance therewith was duly entered.

Such proceedings were had that on the 15th day of October, 1923, Esther M. Stuhldreher, as administratrix of the estate of Jack Stuhldreher, filed in the matter of the said estate a petition for partial payment to creditors. In that petition she asked permission to pay $1,000 out of the assets of the estate to the creditor or creditors entitled thereto. In her petition she alleged that the funeral bills and expenses of last illness and all family allowance had been paid; that the fees of the administratrix and the fees of attorneys for ordinary and extraordinary services had not been paid; that the administratrix had rendered her second account, and that there was cash on hand amounting to $3,670, and that the remaining assets of the estate were speculative and of uncertain value; that a statement of the claims of all the creditors was filed with the first account, and that the total amount of said claims was $9,829.19, and that said estate is insolvent; that the time for filing claims has expired, and that no other claims than those last mentioned have been filed; that, deducting payments made, there was due on the allowed claims $8,025.29; that, in addition to said sum, there is on file the amended judgment hereinabove referred to; that the said judgment was rendered after the death of Jack Stuhldreher, and that Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon claimed that said judgment is a preferred claim against the estate of Jack Stuhldreher, deceased, subject only to the expenses of administration; that there are no other preferred claims, and that, if said judgment is paid, there will be no funds left with which to pay any of said claims other than said judgment creditors; that the said Blanche E. Lemon et al. are entitled to have their rights as preferred creditors determined, and that $1,000, but no greater sum, can safely be paid. Then follows a prayer that a judgment and order be made determining the priority of the judgment and the respective claims and the proportion to which each creditor is entitled and that not to exceed $1,000 be ordered paid. The petition was filed October 15, 1923.

The record shows that the petition was served October 13, 1923, on Fred A. Shaeffer, attorney for Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon, Jr., but it does not show that any notice of the hearing of the petition was given, nor the nature of the notice, if any, and it does not show that any objection to the petition was made in writing or orally, and it does not show what proof, if any, was adduced at the hearing, and, although the petition recited that the administratrix had rendered her second account, the record does not show when said second account was rendered, heard, settled, or what action was taken thereon, or whether any notice of the hearing of said account was given or otherwise.

On July 7, 1924, the attorneys for the administratrix and the attorney for Blanche E. Lemon et al. filed a stipulation:

"That the court may determine the priority, if any, of the said Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon, Jr., whether or not the said Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon, Jr., have a preferred claim based on the award of the Industrial Accident Commission of the state of California, and direct that the payment not to exceed the sum of $1,000 be ordered paid as prayed for in said petition, said payment to be made to the various creditors in accordance with law following the court's determination on the question of priority, it being the intention of this stipulation that the court need not determine the pro rata to which each creditor is entitled at this time."

The record contains a reporter's transcript. That transcript purports to set forth the proceedings that occurred on Monday, November 25, 1923. A reading thereof discloses that the subject-matter before the court was the settling of the second account and the consideration of a petition for the allowance of attorney fees. Nothing is contained therein with reference to the "petition for partial payment to creditors."

On the 7th day of July, 1924, the trial court made an order as follows:

"The petition of Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon, Jr., alleged preferred creditors of the above-entitled estate to have distributed to them the sum of $1,000, as preferred creditors, having heretofore been submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and the court having duly considered the same and being fully advised in the premises, now renders its decision thereon from the bench, and orders that said petition be, and the same is hereby, denied. Let an order be prepared accordingly."

On the 21st day of July, 1924, Blanche E. Lemon and Harland B. Lemon, Jr., contestants and appellants, served a notice of appeal on the attorneys for the administratrix and filed the same. In that notice of appeal they recited that they appealed from an order allowing attorney fees and also from the order quoted above.

In their briefs, counsel do not present any matters of or concerning the allowing of attorney fees, but they confine their briefs solely to the ruling of the court with reference to the making of partial payments to creditors. Except as hereinabove stated, no part of the record is contained in the transcript.

[1] We must assume, until the contrary appears, that the judicial record before us correctly determines and sets forth the rights of the parties. When the petition was before the trial court, it appeared to the trial court that there was on hand the sum of $3,670; that there were some other assets of a speculative and uncertain value that had not been liquidated; that the claims proved and allowed and unpaid amounted to $8,025.29; and that there was in addition thereto outstanding and unpaid a judgment in the sum of $4,058.34. Under these circumstances, if no other facts appeared, the record presents a case where it was peculiarly proper that the court should make no order with reference to the payment of the claims preferred or otherwise, or any part thereof, but, on the other hand, that it should await the time when all of the assets had been marshalled. Estate of Smith, 122 Cal. 462, 55 P. 249. The utmost that the record shows is that the trial court exercised its discretion by refusing to determine whether the judgment was a preferred claim or was not a preferred claim. Certainly nothing appears in the record showing that it abused its discretion.

[2] In their briefs, counsel refer to the stipulation. The filing of the paper was an idle act. The power of the court flowed from the statute, and could neither be increased nor diminished by the stipulation of counsel.

We find no error in the record.

KNOX v. TRIGONIA OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 5190.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 27, 1925.)

1. Account stated ⟸3—Held to exclude idea of moneys mentioned being contingent debt.

Account stated for commissions on sale held to show that the moneys mentioned had become an existing debt, and so exclude the idea of debt being contingent, though providing for payment in installments as vendor was paid.

2. Account stated ⟸9—Held to imply promise to pay.

An account stated held to imply a promise to pay, which is all that is necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by William G. Knox against the Trigonia Oil Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O. C. Wilson and W. F. Russell, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

James M. Thomas and Daniel H. Knox, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action to recover moneys alleged to be due on a stated account. The defendant answered, a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant has appealed. The appellant contends that the debt was contingent, and that on a contingent debt one may not predicate a stated account. The vice in this position is in the assumption that the debt was contingent. It was not.

Prior to the month of July, 1920, some oil lands on the border between Santa Clara and Santa Cruz counties were owned by one Spiegleman. At that time Percy McCabe claimed to have a lease on the lands. Frank Rose, manager of Trigonia Oil & Gas Company, a corporation formed under the laws of Oregon, came to California and opened negotiations for the purchase of said oil lands. For a consideration of $5,000, McCabe agreed to stand aside and allow Rose to conduct his negotiations directly with Spiegleman. As a result of the negotiations, Rose was given such a contract that the Trigonia Oil Company of California was formed, and Spiegleman transferred the property to the corporation under an executory contract which called for certain deferred payments. On July 8, 1921, the defendant executed an indenture in writing, including the following passage:

"728 Phelan Building, San Francisco, Cal.
"July 8—21.

"Trigonia Oil Company of California, Dr., To Percy McCabe $3,500, and James Lester $1,500; Total $5,000.

"For commission assumed on sale of Spiegleman lease, Santa Clara county, at $32,500—commission $5,000, payable in proportion as Spiegleman or Continental Oil & Refining Company is paid. Trigonia Company has paid to date to Spiegleman or Continental Oil & Refining Company $8,500.

Amount now due on account of commission	$1,307 90
Paid to McCabe on account $100.....
Paid to Lester on account $250.....	350 00
Balance	$ 957 90
7—11—21. Paid this date on account.....	250 00
Balance accrued and due.....	$ 707 90

"Balance unaccrued, $3,692.10, or $133.85 per $1,000 on $24,000 unpaid on the lease July 8, 1921.

"Received from the Trigonia Oil Company of California check No. 141 for $250.00 in payment of the above account. Percy McCabe.

"Please receipt and return to Trigonia Oil Company of California, 728 Phelan Bldg., San Francisco, Cal."

[1] A mere inspection of the writing shows that the moneys mentioned, $5,000, had become an existing debt. That debt, however, was made payable to McCabe at such times and in such amounts as should be in proportion to the moneys that were thereafter paid to Spiegleman on his deferred payments. Under these circumstances it is unnecessary to go into the consideration of cases dealing with contingent debts.

[2] The appellant also contends that there was no proof of an agreement to pay, and that such an agreement is an essential element in such an action. In making this contention the appellant is correct, if he means that there must be at least an implied promise to pay. In making the writing above quoted, it is perfectly clear that there was the implied promise to pay. An actual express agreement to pay is not necessary. Mayberry v. Cook, 121 Cal. 588, 54 P. 95; 1 C. J. p. 697, § 301.

We find no error in the record.

JOHNSTON v. JONES, Sheriff of Sacramento County. (Civ. 3012.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 27, 1925.)

Appeal and error ⊜479(1)—Writ of supersedeas will not be granted to stay execution of writ of mandate pending appeal.

Perfecting of appeal being sufficient without undertaking to stay execution of judgment directing issuance of writ of mandate, under Code Civ. Proc. § 949, petition for writ of supersedeas, staying enforcement of writ pending appeal, will be denied without prejudice; there being no presumption that trial court will proceed in disregard of plain provisions of statute and construction thereof by Supreme Court.

Application of Ellis W. Jones, Sheriff of Sacramento County, for a writ of supersedeas staying enforcement of writ of mandate, pending appeal from judgment against him in mandamus proceedings by Catherine M. Johnston. Writ denied without prejudice.

Ralph H. Lewis and Berkeley B. Blake, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application by the defendant for a writ of supersedeas staying the enforcement, pending appeal, of a writ of mandate issued by the trial court, commanding the defendant to release certain "attachments or garnishments * * * served or levied by him," as sheriff, in an action by one Hille against the plaintiff herein.

The petition alleges that the defendant has regularly appealed to this court from the judgment entered against him in the mandamus proceeding; that, notwithstanding such appeal, the plaintiff has threatened to and will apply to the trial court "for an order adjudging appellant guilty of contempt of court in the event that he refuses to release the said attachment in accordance with the said writ of mandate; and appellant is informed and believes and therefore alleges that said court * * * will entertain the said motion * * * to have appellant adjudged guilty of contempt of court."

It is clear that the perfecting of an appeal, without an undertaking, is sufficient to stay execution of a judgment directing the issuance of a writ of mandate. Code Civ. Proc. § 949; People v. Jackson, 190 Cal. 257, 262, 212 P. 4; People v. Laine, 177 Cal. 742, 745, 171 P. 941; Wolf v. Gall, 174 Cal. 140, 142, 162 P. 115. It is not to be presumed, in the absence of a stronger showing than here made, that the trial court will proceed in disregard of the plain provisions of the statute and the construction thereof by the Supreme Court.

The petition is denied without prejudice.

COHEN et al. v. MARSHALL (two cases). (L. A. 7919.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⟸255—Mortgagee may bring action on note secured by mortgage without first foreclosing mortgage.

In action to recover on notes secured by mortgage on crop of peas, which had been destroyed without fault of mortgagee, and on other crops to be grown before 1923, which other crops were planted in December, 1922, and could not possibly mature before year 1923, held that, in view of Civ. Code § 3532, mortgagee could bring action on note without foreclosing mortgage, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 726.

2. Chattel mortgages ⟸255—Evidence held sufficient to support finding that mortgaged property was destroyed without fault of mortgagee.

In action to recover on note secured by mortgage on pea crop, evidence held to support finding that all the crop described in mortgage was destroyed without any fault of the mortgagee, thereby giving mortgagee right to maintain simple action against maker of note.

3. Chattel mortgages ⟸255—Refusal to permit amendment of answer to show clause in mortgage was inserted after signing was proper.

Refusal to permit defendant, in action on notes secured by mortgage, to amend answer to show that clause in mortgage that mortgagee, on deeming himself insecure, might declare whole amount due had been inserted after mortgage was signed was proper, as it must be conclusively presumed that defendants had knowledge of the contents of their own pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Actions by Isadore Cohen and Allen Rabin, doing business under the name of Cohen & Rabin, against Alice C. Marshall and another and against Percy W. Marshall and another. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Turner & Grainger and Richard A. Turner, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Shapiro & Shapiro, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. By agreement the above-entitled causes were tried as one cause; it being stipulated by counsel in said causes that whatever evidence that should be produced therein might be considered and applied by the trial court with reference to the cause in or to which it should properly appear to be material or relevant.

The vital question presented by this appeal is whether the finding of the court to the effect that the security of the mortgagee, consisting of a crop of peas and such other crops as might be grown on certain described premises, had been destroyed without the fault of the mortgagee, thereby giving said mortgagee the right to maintain a simple action against the makers of the note, is supported by the evidence.

Defendants and appellants, husband and wife, owned an interest in several parcels of land situate in Oceanside and Carlsbad districts, respectively, county of San Diego. Said lands were adaptable to the raising of early peas for the market. Appellants were in need of financial assistance to enable them to plant said lands to peas and market the crop. Cohen, Mann & Kahn, Incorporated, with its place of business at the city of Los Angeles, was engaged in handling, buying, selling, and distributing fresh and green fruits and vegetables. On May 19, 1921, appellants entered into a contract with said corporation whereby it was appointed the sole and exclusive agent of appellants for selling and distributing all peas grown by them for the seasons 1921 and 1922. Said corporation was to do all things necessary to consummate said sales of peas in the market, and said appellants were to cultivate and raise the crops. Appellants specifically covenanted to plant to peas 100 acres known as the Russ property, situate at Oceanside. Said corporation was to receive 15 per cent. as commissions on all gross sales delivered to said agent for shipment and distribution. A pooling plan was also a part of the agreement. Said corporation agreed to advance to appellants, as a loan, $30 per acre for each acre planted to peas. One thousand dollars was to be paid upon signing the agreement; $1,000 at the time the acreage was ready to be planted; and the remaining $1,000—making $3,000 in all—at the time the acreage showed an 80 per cent. stand. All advances, such as crating charges, acreage advancements, commissions, and other specified charges were to have priority over all other charges or expenses. The corporation guaranteed 6 cents per pound for all peas received and accepted by it until March, 1922.

On August 29, 1921, a larger sum had been advanced by said corporation than it had agreed to advance. It was thereupon agreed between said parties that a much larger acreage than that originally agreed upon should be planted to peas. The enlarged and revised plan brought into the transaction a $12,000 promissory note executed by appellants in favor of said corporation to secure past, present, and future advancements made and to be made by said corporation to appellants, the payment of which note was secured by a mortgage on the crop.

Said agreement of August 19, 1921, by which an increased area was to be planted to peas and the need of increased financial assistance was provided for, was but an amplification of the purposes of the parties expressed in the agreement of May 19, 1921. On the day of the execution of the agreement dated August 19, 1921, Mr. and Mrs. Marshall, appellants, executed a promissory note, by the terms of which they jointly and severally agreed to pay to the order of Cohen, Mann & Kahn on or after two years from the date thereof the sum of $12,000. It contained the usual provisional clause for attorney's fees. The crop mortgage agreement provided that the payment of the note was secured thereby. It assigned to said corporation, in the language of the instrument, the following crops:

"The crops of peas, barley, and in fact every kind and nature of crop or crops now being, standing, and growing and to be grown up to the 1923 season upon that certain piece or parcel of land, * * *" etc. (Italics supplied.)

The acreage was described as follows: 120 acres known as the Russ land; 80 acres known as the Cary tract; 25 acres known as the McMiels add. The mortgage agreement contained the following provision:

"If at any time the mortgagee deems the security herein insufficient to secure the payment of the moneys advanced herein, then mortgagee may at its option declare the whole of said advances immediately due and payable, and shall be entitled to a judgment against the mortgagors for any deficiency which may arise."

Appellants being unable to obtain credit for fertilizing material necessary to the production of said crop of peas, Cohen, Mann &

Kahn obtained for them a credit with the Pacific Growers' Exchange whereby they were enabled to purchase said material at a cost of $5,070. As a guarantee of the payment of a portion of said debt, Cohen, Mann & Kahn assigned to the Pacific Growers' Exchange an interest in and to said crop contract, and indorsed the promissory note of appellant executed to said Pacific Growers' Exchange in the sum of $5,070, with liability limited to three-quarters of the amount of said indebtedness, to wit, $3,802.50. It was further agreed between Cohen, Mann & Kahn and Pacific Growers' Exchange that, if the proceeds from the first crop of peas was not sufficient to reimburse the former for all moneys advanced to appellants, the note which they had guaranteed should be extended by Pacific Growers' Exchange for a period of six months, and, if necessary, for successive periods of six months until the expiration of the term of the mortgage.

On November 26, 1921, Cohen & Rabin, with the written consent of appellants, and a number of other growers, became the successor of Cohen, Mann & Kahn in all contracts and agreements made by said appellants and said other growers with Cohen, Mann & Kahn, and all right, title, and interest therein was transferred to respondents. We think there is no doubt as to the sufficiency of the considerations that induced the parties to execute the several instruments upon which the action is based.

The complaints were filed January 25, 1922, and attachments were issued thereon and levied upon appellants' property. The causes of action came on for trial April 20, 1923. Judgment went for plaintiffs (respondents) in both cases. In the first for the sum of $7,585.31 and in the second action for the sum of $3,824.33, aggregating $11,409.64, including interest. The claim of $3,802.50, on account of respondents' guarantee for the payment of the Pacific Growers' Exchange note, was not allowed by the court because it had not been paid by respondents. In each action plaintiffs were allowed attorney's fees in the sum of $250, and that amount was included in each of said judgments.

A number of specifications as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings are made. The failure of the court to find on material issues raised by the answers is also assigned as reversible error. The numerous specifications of error may be reduced to a few important questions which will later be noticed.

It is true that crops other than the pea crop were mentioned in the second agreements of the parties as furnishing a part of the security, but there is not the slightest doubt that the parties regarded the pea crop as furnishing the security for said advancements, as it was the central and primary object in the minds of all the parties to the contract. The first agreement specified the exact acreage and the particular lands that were to be planted to peas, and no other kinds of crops were mentioned. While the second agreement mentioned barley and such other crops as might be grown, the evidence shows conclusively that the advancements were made for the planting and cultivation of peas. Much of the moneys expended were expended in leveling, checking, and putting the ground in the condition required for the cultivation of peas.

After the execution and delivery of said note in the sum of $12,000, it continued to be the practice of the parties herein, following the practice that had obtained before its execution, to evidence such advancements made by respondents to appellants by the execution of a promissory note by the latter bearing the date, amount, and rate of interest of each advancement as and when made. The effect of this is that the aggregate amount of indebtedness, with a few exceptions, is shown by a number of separate promissory notes. This, it is contended, was done for convenience and to avoid subsequent disputes as to the amounts advanced.

[1] The complaints allege the destruction of the security by protracted and excessive rains and by aphis pest, without any fault of respondents. This allegation was denied by appellants, and it was contended below, and urged here, that, if it be granted that the pea crop was destroyed, there may have been, and as a fact there were, other crops actually planted on the parcels of land described in the mortgage contract before the expiration of 1922, which crops constituted partial, if not full, security for all advancements made, and therefore, said actions not having been brought to foreclose the mortgage in compliance with the provisions of section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, the right to maintain a personal action against the makers of said note was lost. So much of section 726, Code of Civil Procedure, as is applicable here provides:

"There can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property, which action must be in accordance with the provisions of this chapter."

It is the settled law, however, that in case of a failure or destruction of the security, without the fault of the mortgagee, the mortgagee will not be restricted to a procedure which manifestly must prove to be vain and idle. Section 3532, Civil Code; Republic Truck Sales Co. v. Peak, 194 Cal. 515, 229 P. 331; Toby v. Oregon Pacific R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 490, 33 P. 550; Otto v. Long, 127 Cal. 471, 59 P. 895; Savings Bank v. Central Market, 122 Cal. 28, 54 P. 273; Martin v. Becker, 169 Cal. 301, 146 P. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 171; 18 Cal. Jur., sec. 533, p. 249.

[2] The insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding that "all of the said crop described in said mortgage was entirely destroyed by rain and aphis without any act of the plaintiffs or the person to whom the security was given" is not open to serious question. The pea season in the Oceanside and Carlsbad districts begins about the middle of November of each year, and concludes the following spring. Shipments began in the year 1921, on the 29th day of November, and were discontinued January 10, 1922. During the latter part of December, 1921, and the fore part of January, 1922, the rainfall in the districts in which the crops were growing was excessive and protracted. By the middle of January, as described by two or three witnesses called by respondents, the vines had fallen to the ground, the roots were water-soaked and injured, the blossoms had dropped from the vines, and the fields were literally alive with a pest known as aphis, and covered with the honey that said pest spreads. The vines had the appearance of being dead or in a dying condition, and the entire crop was absolutely unmarketable. Some evidence was offered by appellants which tended to show that a part of the crop could have been saved or salvaged had respondents advanced the sum of $600, which request was made of it by appellants, but respondents refused to grant it. This issue, however, was found against the appellants by the trial court. Another contention made by appellants is that on the day the suits were filed there was growing upon said premises a crop of barley consisting of about 15 acres. Respondents and the witnesses called by them testified that they had made repeated visits to said premises, and had thoroughly inspected the same, and there were no other crops growing thereon, except a small truck garden and a few tomato vines that were of no consequence. The 15 acres above mentioned were "undeveloped land," and the value of said barley crop above the cost of harvesting, if anything, was not stated. It was probably inconsequential. But, however this may be, it would seem that appellants received the benefit of the crop.

We think there is no merit in the position taken by appellants that certain crops of barley or oats sown in December, 1922, were a part of the mortgaged property. This crop or other crops so planted would not mature until several months after the beginning of 1923, and were not included in the agreements of the parties as part of the mortgage security. This is made clear by an inspection of the contracts and an examination of the evidence. No lien upon those crops was within the contemplation of the contracting parties. The mortgage is confined to the "crop or crops now being, standing and growing and to be grown up to the season 1923." Of course, crops planted in December, 1922, would not mature by January 1, 1923. Only crops that could reasonably be expected to mature and be ready to be gathered before January, 1923, were intended to be, or were, as a matter of fact, subject to the mortgage lien.

The rule of law announced in Arques v. Wasson, 51 Cal. 620, 21 Am. Rep. 718, and other cases, as to the potential existence of crops not sown at the time a mortgage is given upon them, has no application to the issue involved here. We recognize the rule of law as there stated. The contract in the instant case, considered with reference to the evidence, shows that the case is entirely without the rule announced in Arques v. Wasson, supra. There is also evidence in the instant case to the effect that appellant Percy W. Marshall declared, early in January, 1922, that he would not sow or plant any other or further crops.

[3] Clearly the trial court did not abuse its discretion by refusing leave to appellants to amend their answers during the trial of the cause by setting up specific denials to the effect that the mortgage, when signed by them, did not contain the clause and provision that, if at any time the mortgagee should deem the security insufficient to secure the moneys advanced by it, said mortgagee reserved the right at its option to declare the whole of said advancements immediately due and payable, and would be entitled to a judgment against the mortgagors for any deficiency which might be shown to exist. At the time the request to amend was made it was contended that said clause had been surreptitiously inserted in the mortgage contract after it had been executed and before it was offered for record. This motion was made months after the signing of said contract. The clause now challenged as not having been a provision of the contract as signed not only appeared in the mortgage as pleaded by respondents as an exhibit, but it was also specifically set out and stressed in the body of the complaint. Moreover, it was also pleaded by appellants in their answers by way of an exhibit in precisely the same language as it appears in the original instrument and in said complaints. The fact that said clause had been typed into the mortgage by way of interlineation by the use of a typewriting machine of different pattern than the one that had been used in preparing the body of the mortgage was not such a circumstance as to arouse the suspicions of the trial court in the face of the fact that other interlineations, corrections, and insertions which were not questioned had been similarly made apparently by the use of the same typewriting machine. The circumstances attending this particular point are such that it must be conclusively presumed that appellants had knowledge of the contents of the pleadings, especially of their own. The court committed no abuse of discretion by its ruling.

Every defense that appellants urge before this court was made an issue at the trial, and a finding was thereupon made in the court below. Appellants were denied no right that they would have been entitled to had the action been one in form to foreclose the mortgage rather than a simple action on the note. The allegations of fraud and bad faith on the part of respondents and the alleged damages flowing therefrom were fully presented and determined, as were all disputed questions arising out of said controversy. To reverse the cases under such circumstances, in the absence of a showing of resultant injury, would be sacrificing the substance of the actions to an empty form of law.

The evidence being sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court, the judgment in each case is affirmed.

MYERS, C. J. Plaintiffs appeal herein from a judgment in favor of defendants and from an order made subsequent to judgment, denying plaintiffs' motion for an order setting aside the judgment and for a new trial. The action is a suit to quiet title. The complaint is in the conventional form of a complaint to quiet title under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure. It alleges the ownership and possession of plaintiffs of the premises described in the complaint; that the defendants claim an estate or interest therein; that the claims of the defendants are without right, and prays that the defendants be required to set forth the nature of their respective claims; that it be decreed that the plaintiffs are the owners of the property; that their title be quieted; and that defendants be enjoined from asserting any title thereto. The defendants Young answered, disclaiming any interest or estate in the property and were dismissed from the action. There was no error in this. Code Civ. Proc. § 739. The defendant Lorenz answered, denying the allegations of plaintiffs' ownership of the premises and affirmatively alleging ownership in himself and praying for a decree adjudging his title therein. The cause came on for trial October 25, 1923, pursuant to due notice of the time and place of trial. Counsel who then represented plaintiffs appeared without his clients and moved to dismiss the action, which motion was denied. Thereupon the trial proceeded. Counsel for plaintiffs neither produced nor offered any evidence tending to support the allegations of the complaint. Counsel for defendant

Lorenz produced oral and documentary evidence tending to establish title in him. Findings of fact and conclusions of law in regular form and responsive to all of the issues framed by the pleadings, together with judgment adjudging title to the premises in the defendant Lorenz, were signed and filed. At the oral argument upon the hearing before this court counsel for appellants expressly conceded that the appeal from the judgment herein is without legal merit, for the reason that there was no evidence upon which the court could have given judgment for the plaintiffs.

The record upon this appeal was prepared pursuant to the provisions of section 953a et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, and consists of typewritten clerk's and reporter's transcripts. It appears from the clerk's transcript herein that on the 14th day of December, 1923, plaintiffs moved the court for an order setting aside the judgment and for a new trial, which motion was denied. The notice of motion signed by counsel for plaintiffs and directed to counsel for defendants was as follows:

"Gentlemen: Take notice that upon the affidavits of Hedley Richmond and Dr. L. C. House, copies of which are herewith served upon you, and upon the pleadings and proceedings on file in said action, the undersigned will, on the 14th day of December, 1923, at 10:00 o'clock a. m. of that day at the courthouse in the city of El Centro, California, move the court for an order setting aside the judgment in this action and for a new trial herein upon the grounds set out in the affidavits hereto attached."

[1-3] It will be noted that no grounds of the motion were stated in the notice, which recited that the motion would be made "upon the grounds set out in the affidavits hereto attached." It does not appear that such or any affidavits were attached. In fact, it does not appear that such or any affidavits were presented or filed in connection with this motion. In so far as we are able to ascertain from the clerk's transcript, it indicates affirmatively that no such affidavits were presented or filed in support of this motion or at any time, except in connection with and in support of a subsequent motion which was presented on January 10, 1924. This court has repeatedly held that the clerk's transcript is incompetent to authenticate for the purpose of a review upon appeal any portion of the record other than the judgment roll and notice of appeal. 2 Cal. Juris. p. 633. If any matters other than such as appear upon the face of the judgment roll are sought to be reviewed upon appeal, the record thereof must be presented either by a bill of exceptions or by a reporter's transcript. Bell v. Brigance, 194 Cal. 445, 229 P. 27; Martin v. Pac. G. & E. Co. (Cal. Sup.), 234 P. 321. In the case of an appeal from an order after judgment predicated upon affidavits the supporting papers to be entitled to consideration upon appeal must either (1) be incorporated in a bill of exceptions settled, certified, and signed by the trial judge, certifying that such papers were used at the hearing upon such motion, or (2) they must be incorporated in a reporter's transcript settled and certified in like manner by the trial judge. The clerk's transcript indicates merely that certain papers were filed in his office and the date of their filing. It does not indicate, and the clerk is not competent to certify for purposes of review upon appeal, what papers were presented to and considered by the trial judge in support of or in opposition to a given motion. However, in the present case, as noted above, the clerk's transcript does indicate affirmatively that no affidavits were on file which could have been used in support of the motion at the hearing on December 14, 1923. The order denying that motion must therefore be affirmed.

Thereafter, and on January 10, 1924, plaintiffs by leave of court renewed their motion to set aside the judgment and grant a new trial. Upon this occasion they specified in their notice six grounds upon which the motion would be made, and supported the same by affidavits served and filed therewith. Upon the showing there made the learned trial judge might well have granted the relief prayed for under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, upon the ground of excusable neglect. However this may be, he did not do so, but denied the motion. No appeal was taken from this order, and we are, therefore without jurisdiction to review it. The only notice of appeal which appears in the record was filed January 7, 1924, and is directed solely at the judgment and the order of December 14, 1923.

[4] We have assumed that the motion of December 14, 1923, was not a motion for new trial under section 656 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, but was a motion for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the order denying it was therefore appealable as a special order after final judgment. If it be assumed to have been intended as an ordinary motion for new trial, the order denying it would be reviewable upon the appeal from the judgment. So regarded, it must be held to have been properly denied, for the reason that no grounds were designated in the notice of motion (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 659, 657), and for the further reason that no showing was made in support thereof. The motion of January 10, 1924, cannot be regarded as a motion for new trial under section 656 et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, because appellants had then lost their right to proceed under those sections by lapse of time.

No contention has been made in behalf of appellants herein, either in their brief or at the oral argument, that the court erred in denying their motion to dismiss the action. That question, therefore, is not before us.

[5] Perhaps it should be further pointed out for the information of members of the bar that respondent herein would have been entitled to an order affirming the judgment and order appealed from, upon motion, if he had made such motion in this court. This for the reason that appellants have wholly failed to print any portion of the record in their brief or in a supplement thereto. Not a word of the pleadings, findings, judgment, order, or testimony is to be found in appellants' brief as is expressly required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure. It has been reiterated approximately 100 times in the decisions of this court and of the District Courts of Appeal that it is incumbent upon an appellant who relies upon a typewritten transcript to print in his brief or in a printed supplement thereto sufficient of the record to justify a reversal of the judgment or order appealed from. 2 Cal. Juris. 643 et seq. Furthermore, as we pointed out some months ago (Estate of Berry [Cal. Sup.] 233 P. 330), since the 1923 amendment to the section last cited, an appellant who fails to do this incurs thereby the risk that the order or judgment appealed from may be affirmed upon motion. In the present case, however, respondent made no such motion. On the contrary, he printed as a supplement to his own brief substantially the entire record upon this appeal. For this reason, and for the further reason that appellants seem (from the statements in their brief) to have been the victims of a most unusual combination of unfortunate accidents, we have given consideration to the merits of their appeal.

Upon the record before us we are impelled to the conclusion that the judgment and order appealed from must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PERRY et al. v. SIMEONE et al. (S. F. 11069.)

1. Evidence ⟸14—No judicial notice that 15 year old girl is incompetent to drive automobile.

Court cannot take judicial notice, as matter of common knowledge, that 15 year old girl is incompetent to drive an automobile, especially in view of St. 1923, p. 532, § 63, prohibiting issuance of operator's license to any one under 14.

2. Parent and child ⟸13(1)—Parents held not liable for death caused by minor daughter's negligent operation of automobile.

Parents, without knowledge that 15 year old daughter, driving their automobile with their passive permission, had ever been careless in operation thereof, held not liable for death of another automobilist in collision, due to her negligence, where they had signed no application by her for license to operate automobile, so as to render them jointly liable with her under Motor Vehicle Act, § 24, as amended by St. 1919, p. 223.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Ella M. Perry and others against Louise Simeone and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to named defendant, and reversed as to other defendants.

Leland H. Walker and O. H. Speciale, both of San Jose, for appellants.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondents.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. The controversy involved in this appeal arose out of a collision between two automobiles—one of which was driven by plaintiffs' decedent, and the other by defendant Louise Simeone—and which collision resulted in the death of plaintiffs' decedent, and on account of which death judgment was rendered against all the defendants in the sum of $15,000.

Defendant Louise Simeone is the daughter of the other defendants. At the time the accident occurred, the daughter was of the age of 15 years. She was not accompanied by either of her parents—the evidence being that they were absent from their home and knew nothing of the accident until after its occurrence—nor had they or either of them given express consent to their daughter to operate the automobile, which was the property of the father, L. Simeone. However, the evidence was sufficient to justify the inference that the daughter had at least passive permission to use the automobile.

The fact of the negligent operation of the automobile by the daughter at the time the accident occurred, and the further fact that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury which resulted in the death of plaintiffs' decedent, are admitted by the appellants. While there was some evidence to the effect that on two or three occasions the daughter had been known to drive the automobile in a presumably careless manner, there was nothing to show that either of the parents ever had any knowledge of such alleged, or any, carelessness on the part of the daughter, but, to the contrary, that from their personal observation the daughter, when permitted by the parents to drive the automobile, had always done so in a prudent manner.

There is no claim on the part of respondents that the relationship of agency existed between the parents and the daughter in the matter of the operation of the automobile at the time the accident occurred. The lack of knowledge on the part of the parents of any actual incompetency of the daughter to drive the automobile by reason of her careless operation thereof being shown, the principal question, and in fact the turning point involved in the appeal, is whether or not the parents of a 15 year old daughter, who permit such daughter to operate an automobile, are liable for any damages caused by the negligent operation of the automobile by the daughter.

[1] The effect of respondents' contention in this regard is that the court should take judicial notice of the fact that a girl of 15 years of age cannot possibly be competent to operate an automobile. By way of authority on the subject, the nearest approach thereto which has come to the attention of the court is an opinion of the Texas Court of Civil Appeals (Allen v. Bland, 168 S. W. 35), wherein that court held that a father must be held to have known that a boy of the age of 11 years, weighing 85 pounds, when intrusted with an unusually heavy and high-powered automobile, driving the same alone upon the public streets, would be "inclined to be venturesome," and "that danger necessarily attended his use of the car under such conditions." There was in that case, however, direct evidence of the boy's incompetence or recklessness, and the Texas court concluded that "very little evidence along this line was necessary to sustain plaintiff's case."

It is urged by respondents that, because the state has seen fit to make a girl a minor until she reaches the age of 18 years, it should follow that, she being in law rendered incapable of governing herself until she becomes of that age, by the same token she is also unfit to operate an automobile up to that time. Following the same reasoning, a young man would not be legally qualified to drive an automobile until he reached the age of 21 years. If legislative enactments are to be looked to as evidence of the common knowledge, the provision in section 63 of the California Vehicle Act of 1923 (Stats. 1923, pp. 517, 532), prescribing the minimum age limit for operators and chauffeurs and providing that "an operator's license shall not be issued to any person under the age of 14 years * * *" must be regarded as a declaration that persons of the age of 15 years may be competent to operate motor vehicles.

While in matters requiring deliberation in thought it may not be seriously questioned that persons of mature age may be better qualified to pass judgment than those who have not reached their majority, it may not be so clear that on occasions demanding quick decision and rapid action the younger person does not excel the latter and have a distinct advantage in that respect. Skillful driving of an automobile approaches an art. It may be acquired by some persons who are particularly adapted to it within a comparatively short time, and by others, of whatever age or intelligence, apparently without reference to the earnestness or the attention or the time devoted thereto, it is an impossibility. A person habitually careless, or one of a preoccupied disposition, is unlikely to become careful or attentive when placed in charge as a driver of an automobile. The slightest inattention at a critical moment is apt to result in disaster. While, after long practice, the driving of an automobile may become more or less mechanical, nevertheless, alertness is imperatively demanded in order that danger may be timely noticed and threatened injury may be avoided. Accidents usually happen in the "twinkling of an eye." In an emergency a quick mind and co-ordinating suppleness of muscle are more valuable as a preventive of injury than a deliberate brain and an enfeebled body. The former characteristics belong especially to youth. Generally speaking, a girl of 15 years, while perhaps not possessing them in their fullness and perfection, is at least quite as likely to be endowed therewith as the average individual of mature or of middle age. So that, from a standpoint of "judicial notice," as contended by respondents, the claimed incompetency of the daughter of the elder defendants (solely because of the age of the daughter) to drive an automobile cannot be said to have indisputable existence as a matter of common knowledge.

[2] Nor does the law comport with the claimed liability of the parents. It has long been considered as a settled general principle that the parent is not liable for the torts of his minor child. It is only by direct statutory provision that the rule is relaxed or modified. An example thereof may be found in section 24 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1915, pp. 397, 411, as amended by Stats. 1919, pp. 191, 223), where it is provided:

"* * * That it shall be unlawful for any person to cause or knowingly to permit his or her child, ward or employee to operate or drive a motor vehicle upon the public highway whether as a chauffeur or operator, without having first obtained such license as is hereinbefore specified; provided, that the application to the department of a minor to operate or drive a motor vehicle whether as chauffeur or operator, shall not be granted by the department unless the parent or parents having the custody of such applicant or the guardian of such applicant shall have joined in said application by signing the same; and provided, further, that any negligence of a minor, so licensed, in operating or driving a motor vehicle upon the public highway, whether as chauffeur or operator, shall be imputed to the person or persons who shall have signed the application of such minor for said license, which person or persons shall be jointly and severally liable with such minor for any damages caused by such negligence."

In the case of Buelke v. Levenstadt, 190 Cal. 684, 214 P. 42, relied upon by respondents to establish the liability of the parents of the minor daughter herein, an uncle of the minor had signed the minor's application for a license to operate an automobile. Under the provisions of the statute, one who stood "in loco parentis" to a minor, and who signed the application as "father," was held liable for the negligent operation by the minor of the automobile. And in Rocca v. Steinmetz, 61 Cal. App. 102, 214 P. 257, the ruling is that (syllabus):

"An owner of an automobile who permits his son to use it, with knowledge that his son is a careless and reckless driver, is guilty of negligence, and liable for damage caused by the son in the operation of the machine."

Those cases, however, are distinguishable from the instant case. The former case depended upon the application of a statute which expressly deviated from the general rule as to the nonliability of the parent, and made the parent liable if he had signed the minor's application for a license to operate an automobile. No such fact is connected with the instant case. The minor daughter was not driving the automobile as a licensed operator, but was driving it in defiance of the terms of the statute, and hence came under the conditions of the general rule affecting the nonliability of parents for the torts of their children. In the latter case, the parent, with full knowledge on his part of the fact that the son was a careless and reckless driver, permitted him to use the automobile. In the case at bar, the parents had no knowledge of the fact (assuming it to be true) that the daughter was or ever had been careless in the operation of the automobile. Indeed, as heretofore stated, their only knowledge and observation of the daughter's habits in that regard were that the daughter drove the car in a prudent and careful manner.

In the case first cited (Buelke v. Lavenstadt, 190 Cal. 684, 689, 214 P. 42, 44), in speaking of the possible liability of a parent for the negligent operation by his minor child of an automobile, the court said:

"In the case of an injury by an automobile, the liability rests not alone upon the fact of ownership, but upon the combined negligence of the driver in the operation of the automobile, and of the owner in intrusting the machine to an incompetent driver. Berry on Automobiles (2d Ed.) § 603; Parker v. Wilson, 179 Ala. 361, 371, 60 So. 150, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 87."

And in the second case the matter is thus presented by the court:

"It is the claim of respondent that no such liability [of the parent] is shown, and he thinks the situation is covered by this question: 'May a father, who owns an automobile, be held liable in an action for damage resulting from personal injuries simply and solely because he loaned his automobile to an adult son, who took the same for a pleasure ride, there being no business relation between father and son, in connection with the ride that resulted disastrously?' He answers the question in the negative, and in support thereof he cites Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209 [14 A. L. R. 1083, 193 P. 255]. If the case were as thus presented by respondent, we should be compelled to agree with him in his conclusion."

Within very recent years it has been held by this court that, where no question of agency was involved, a father who was the owner of an automobile, but who was not personally negligent in the matter of its use by his adult daughter, could not be held liable for damages sustained by third persons by reason of the negligent operation of the automobile by the daughter, even though the automobile was maintained by the father for the general convenience, use, and pleasure of the members of his family and was operated by such persons with the father's consent. Spence v. Fisher, 184 Cal. 209, 193 P. 255, 14 A. L. R. 1083. To the same effect is Idemoto v. Scheidecker, 193 Cal. 653, 226 P. 922. See, also, Hill v. Jacquemart, 55 Cal. App. 498, 203 P. 1021; Sanfilippo v. Lesser, 59 Cal. App. 86, 210 P. 44; Grillich v. Weinshenk, 64 Cal. App. 474, 222 P. 160. Another case which also has direct application to the facts herein is Arrelano v. Jorgensen, 52 Cal. App. 622, 199 P. 855, where, as here, the parents permitted their minor son to operate an automobile without his first having procured an operator's license so to do. It was there contended that the violation by the parents of the law heretofore quoted, requiring them to obtain a license for the minor to drive the automobile, should not operate as a release from liability. The court said that it was well settled that the act or omission constituting the violation of law must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages could be founded upon it. And the ruling of the court, as summed up in the syllabus, was:

"The parents of a minor cannot be held liable for personal injuries received and damages to property sustained by reason of a collision of an automobile owned by such minor and negligently operated by him, from the mere fact that they knowingly permitted him to operate the machine without the license required by the Motor Vehicle Act of 1917 [St. 1917, p. 382], in the absence of any evidence causally connecting the absence of the license with the injuries."

For the foregoing reasons, and because of the authorities cited herein, it follows that, so far as defendants L. Simeone and Rosalie Simeone, the parents of Louise Simeone, are concerned, the judgment should be reversed. Otherwise, and so far as concerns the defendant Louise Simeone, the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

HEMRY v. AMOS. (L. A. 8032.)

1. Compromise and settlement ⟸2—Court may direct performance of compromise settlement on basis of which defendant's future acts were to be performed.

Where an agreement, made pending an accounting suit by principal against agent, was a compromise agreement, requiring defendant to perform future acts, and such agreement was pleaded in the accounting suit, equity court may direct performance of such acts as against contention that agreement was a mere accord, which, when not followed by satisfaction, was not a bar to accounting.

2. Covenants ⟸22—Agent's conveyance of land to principal equitably entitled thereto not construed as carrying covenant against incumbrances; "grant."

Conveyance of Florida lands by agents, holding bare legal title, to his principal, already entitled thereto in equity, cannot be construed as carrying with it a covenant against incumbrances, especially in view of law of Florida, according to which it must be interpreted; word "grant" not implying such covenant under law of that state.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by F. L. Hemry against J. A. Amos. From a judgment for plaintiff in an unsatisfactory amount, he appeals. Modified, and affirmed as modified.

McNabb & Hodge and William Guthrie, all of San Bernardino, for appellant.

Daley & Byrne and W. E. Byrne, all of San Bernardino, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in his favor in an action for an accounting, and is taken upon the judgment roll. The appellant makes two contentions: First, that the judgment is not supported by the pleadings, findings of fact, or conclusions of law, but is contrary thereto; second, that the trial court was in error in not allowing the plaintiff his costs upon a judgment in his favor. As to the latter point, the respondent admits that the trial court was in error and consents to a modification of the judgment in that regard. The sole question for discussion is therefore whether the judgment is supported by the pleadings, findings, and conclusions of law. The action, as we have seen, was for an accounting between the plaintiff as a principal and the defendant as his alleged agent in a considerable number of transactions involving the investment of the plaintiff's money and purchase, handling, and transfer of certain personal and real property extending over a period of years. The plaintiff alleged various acts of misconduct on the part of the defendant in relation to these properties, and demanded an accounting of the defendant's dealings with the plaintiff's said properties and the turning over of what remained of the same or their value to the plaintiff and for general relief. The defendant's original answer, while admitting the agency, denied specifically any acts of misconduct on his part, and put in issue practically all of the averments of the complaint involving his dealings with the plaintiff's several properties. The original complaint was filed on November 12, 1921. On November 14, 1921, the plaintiff and defendant met and entered into and executed a written agreement purporting to cover the matters in controversy between them. This agreement the defendant set forth in and made a part of his answer, and pleaded it as a bar to plaintiff's cause of action. Thereafter the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, wherein he alleged in substance that the defendant had taken advantage of his old age and inexperience in business and had, by fraudulent pretensions and representations, overreached him in the making and terms of said agreement of November 14, 1921, and that the plaintiff had, on February 10, 1922, rescinded the same. To this supplemental complaint the defendant presented and filed a supplemental answer and subsequent thereto several amendments thereto, denying its incriminatory averments, and alleging that said agreement of November 14, 1921, had been in certain essential respects performed by him, and was not subject to rescission. He also in these pleadings makes certain allegations with respect to the execution by himself and his wife of a certain deed to the plaintiff of certain lands in Florida in performance of said agreement, which lands were at the time thereof incumbered with a mortgage, and that it was not the intent of the parties to said agreement and to said deed, in execution of the terms thereof, that said lands should be by said deed conveyed free and clear of such incumbrance, but subject thereto; and that, under the laws of the state of Florida, where the lands covered by said deed were situate, such a conveyance did not carry with it a covenant against incumbrances.

After the issues had thus been made up, the court proceeded to try the cause before a jury, which rendered a general verdict in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $20,000. Thereupon the defendant made a motion that the court disregard such verdict and proceed to make its findings of fact and conclusions of law and render its decision thereon. The court granted said motion, and set aside said verdict as contrary to law and excessive and unsupported by the evidence, and thereupon proceeded to make and file its findings of fact and conclusions of law. In so doing it dealt specifically, at great length, and with much detail, with the averments, admissions, and denials of the pleadings of the respective parties, and particularly with the agreement between them, executed on November 14, 1921, with respect to which the court held that the same was entered into by the plaintiff freely and with full knowledge of each and all of the transactions between the parties referred to therein and adjusted thereby, and was a valid and subsisting agreement, and constituted a full and complete settlement of the account between the parties thereto and to this litigation, that said agreement had as to the real property referred to therein been fully performed by the defendant, and that, by virtue of the terms thereof, there was due from the defendant to the plaintiff the sum of $4,165 and no more. Judgment was ordered and entered accordingly for said sum without costs, and, from said judgment, the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The main contention of the appellant upon this appeal is that the agreement entered into between the parties hereto upon November 14, 1921, was in the nature of an accord, and that, since certain of the agreements therein to be performed by the defendant had not been performed, and said accord not having been by reason thereof accompanied or followed by a satisfaction, the said agreement was thereby rendered wholly ineffectual, and ought not therefore to have been considered or enforced by the trial court as constituting a compromise and settlement of the account between the parties. The appellant cites numerous cases to the effect that an accord, when not accompanied or followed by a satisfaction, is ineffectual as a bar to an action of this character. With these cases we have no quarrel, but the difficulty is with the appellant's contention that the agreement in question was in fact or in its essential nature an accord. An examination of said agreement convinces us that it was not an accord, but a compromise and settlement of the pending controversy between the parties, the terms and conditions of which were on the part of the defendant to be fully executed at some future time, but which was intended to be what the trial court found it to be, a present settlement of the account between the parties thereto upon the basis of which the future acts of the defendant were to be performed. Such being the nature of said agreement, it was the proper function of a court of equity to carry its provisions into effect by directing the performance thereof by the defendant, and this is what the court has done in the instant case. The case of Armstrong v. Sacramento Valley Railroad Company, 179 Cal. 648, 178 P. 516, is as to the principles involved precisely in point, and it and the authorities cited therein are made the basis of this decision.

[2] With respect to the conveyance by the defendant and his wife to plaintiff of certain lands situate in Florida, the trial court has found that the conveyance which said defendant was by the terms of said agreement to make to said plaintiff was merely a conveyance from an agent, holding the bare legal title, to his principal of lands which were already his in equity, and that such conveyance was not to be construed as carrying with it a covenant against incumbrances for this reason, as well as for the reason that, since it purported to convey the title to lands in Florida, it was to be interpreted according to the laws of the place where the lands were situated, wherein the use of the word "grant" in a deed did not imply a covenant against incumbrances. The case of Platner v. Vincent, 187 Cal. 443, 202 P. 655, is authority for this latter conclusion. It follows that, as to his main contention, the plaintiff's appeal is without merit. As to the matter of the allowance of costs in his favor by the trial court, the plaintiff, it is conceded, was entitled to such allowance, and the judgment herein should, without reversal, be modified in that regard.

It is therefore ordered that the trial court be, and it is hereby, directed to modify its judgment herein so as to provide for the recovery by the plaintiff of his costs, and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

KEENA v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 10631.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸930(2)—Jury presumed to have followed court's instructions.

In considering questions of negligence charged against defendant in action for death of minor child, Supreme Court must presume that jury, in finding verdict against defendant, followed trial court's instructions not to do so, unless they found that defendant was guilty of negligence proximately causing injuries to child, and that neither latter nor its parents were contributorily negligent.

2. Appeal and error ⟸843(3)—Whether jury found defendant guilty of only one or more of several elements of negligence immaterial, if evidence sufficient to sustain verdict on any one.

Whether jury found appellant guilty of only one or more of several elements of negligence involved is immaterial on appeal, if there be sufficient evidence to sustain verdict on any one of such elements.

3. Appeal and error ⟸930(1)—Evidence tending to sustain verdict accepted as true, unless palpably false.

In passing on sufficiency of evidence, evidence must be so construed as to support verdict to extent that it is fairly susceptible of such construction, and, in case of conflict, that tending to sustain verdict must be accepted as true, unless inherently so improbable as to be palpably false.

4. Appeal and error ⟸996 — Negligence for jury, not reviewing court, where inferences may be drawn for or against it.

Where evidence of negligence consists of circumstances, from which inferences may be drawn for or against it, it is province of jury, not of reviewing court, to determine whether there was negligence.

5. Street railroads ⟸114(10)—Unlawful speed shown by evidence.

Testimony of two gripmen, not refuted by members of crew of car causing death, or any other witnesses, held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff on issue as to operation of car at speed prohibited by municipal ordinance.

6. Street railroads ⟸117(7)—Whether effect of testimony as to speed was destroyed by absence of other evidence held for jury.

Whether effect of gripmen's testimony, as to operation of car at speed prohibited by ordinance, was totally destroyed by absence of evidence that gripman of car causing death saw decedent, when car was within two feet of him, and immediately applied brakes, held for jury.

7. Evidence ⟸586(3, 4) — Negative testimony as to signals held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff.

Testimony of witnesses of accident, who were on sidewalk near street intersection, that they heard no bell rung or other warning given, as required by ordinance, held sufficient to sustain verdict for plaintiff, especially in absence of testimony that bell was rung or gong sounded.

8. Street railroads ⟸117(10)—Whether gripman, failed to look ahead held for jury.

Whether gripman, operating street car in the middle of the day on straight stretch of street without traffic in immediate vicinity, failed to look ahead, so as to observe what was before him, held for jury in action for death of child struck by car.

9. Street railroads ⟸114(21) — Inference gripman's negligence proximately caused death of child held warranted.

Evidence of any of several acts of negligence relied on in action for death of child struck by street car held to warrant inference that defendant's negligence proximately caused injuries and death; direct evidence of proximate cause being unnecessary, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1958, 1960.

10. Trial ⟸122—Conduct of plaintiff's counsel, in reference to defendant's failure to call witness, held improper.

Conduct of plaintiff's counsel, in stating that defendant's counsel might read testimony of absent witness at former trial, and examining defendant's counsel as to whether such witness was present in court on day before and had been discharged from defendant's employ, for stated purpose of showing willful suppression of evidence, held improper.

11. Evidence ⟸77(1)—Failure to call witness within party's power to produce does not amount to willful suppression of evidence.

When evidence tends to prove material fact imposing liability on party, and he refuses to produce evidence in his power to produce, which would overthrow case made, if not founded on fact, presumption arises that such evidence would operate to his prejudice and support adversary's case, but failure to call witness to so testify does not amount to willful suppression of evidence.

12. Appeal and error ⟸1060(1)—Attorney's references to defendant's failure to call witness as willful suppression of evidence held reversible error.

Misconduct of plaintiff's counsel in stating that defendant's counsel might read testimony of absent witness at last trial, and examining defendant's counsel as to presence of such witness in court on day before and his discharge from defendant's employ, for stated purpose of showing willful suppression of evidence, held reversible error, as prejudicially and materially affecting defendant's substantial rights, where evidence, though sufficiently substantial to support verdict for plaintiff, was very weak and unsatisfactory.

Lawlor, Acting C. J., and Seawell, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action by Michael T. Keena against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied; LAWLOR and SEAWELL, JJ., dissenting.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HOUSER, Justice pro tem. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal (prepared by Mr. Justice Knight) upon the several points involved in this appeal, with the exception of that part hereinafter indicated, is as follows:

"About 2 o'clock, on the afternoon of May 9, 1918, at the intersection of Castro and Nineteenth streets, in San Francisco, plaintiff's infant son, of the age of between 4 and 5 years, was struck by one of defendant's cable cars, and died as a result of the injuries sustained, for which a jury, in this action, awarded plaintiff damages. The defendant has appealed.

"In a previous trial plaintiff recovered a verdict, but upon appeal the judgment was reversed because the jury was erroneously instructed upon the subject of contributory negligence. Keena v. United Railroads, 57 Cal. App. 124, 207 P. 35.

"Respondent's cause of action is based upon the claim that, at the time of, and immediately preceding, the accident said cable car was being operated at an excessive rate of speed, in violation of the municipal ordinance limiting the speed of street cars to 15 miles an hour; that there was a failure to ring a bell or sound a gong as required by said ordinance; and that the gripman, who was operating said car, negligently failed to look ahead or observe what was before him on the street.

"Appellant's first contention, upon this appeal, is that there is no evidence whatever to establish any one of three elements of negligence above mentioned, and that even if there were, the essential and additional element of proximate cause is entirely missing from respondent's case.

"Nineteenth street extends in an easterly and westerly direction. Castro street intersects and runs at right angles therewith, and between Twentieth and Nineteenth streets it follows a straight course. The cable car in question descended on a 5 per cent. grade down Castro street and had reached the northerly crossing of Nineteenth street, when the child was struck. The accident was witnessed by five school girls, but none of them saw the boy until the car was within two feet of him; he was then on the strip of pavement, between the double tracks, walking backwards toward the approaching car. After being struck by the car, the child was dragged a distance of some 60 or 70 feet before the car was stopped. The parents of the child lived on the south side of Nineteenth street, a block and a half from the scene of the accident and when the mother last saw him prior to the accident he was playing unattended, on the north side of Nineteenth street opposite the family home.

[1-4] "In considering these questions of negligence, we must presume that the jury, in finding a verdict against the appellant, followed the instructions of the trial court to the effect that a verdict should not be rendered against appellant, unless the jury found that the appellant was guilty of such negligence as proximately caused the injuries to said child, and also found that there was no contributory negligence on the part of either of the parents of the child or the child. It is immaterial, however, so far as this appeal is concerned, whether the jury found appellant guilty of only one or more of the elements of negligence involved, if, in fact, there be sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict on any one of those elements. Furthermore, in passing upon the question of the insufficiency of the evidence, the evidence must be so construed as to support the verdict to the extent that it is fairly susceptible of such construction, and in all cases of conflict to accept as true that evidence which tends to sustain the verdict, unless it is inherently so improbable as to be palpably false. Gett v. Pacific Gas & Electric Co., 192 Cal. 621, 221 P. 376. And where the evidence of negligence consists of circumstances from which inferences may be drawn for or against it, it is the province of the jury to determine whether or not there was negligence. Benson v. Central P. R. R. Co., 98 Cal. 45, 32 P. 809, 33 P. 206; Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 P. 734. In other words, the inferences to be drawn from proved facts must be drawn by the jury and not by the reviewing court. Alameda County v. Tieslau, 44 Cal. App. 332, 186 P. 398.

"We think the record before us reveals evidence, sufficiently substantial to support the verdict; that is, that there is evidence showing circumstances from which the jury might reasonably conclude that appellant was guilty of any one or all of the asserted acts of negligence, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries to the child.

[5] "As to evidence of the violation of the municipal ordinance which declares a limitation of speed of 15 miles an hour for street cars, it was shown that the speed of the cable by which this car was being operated was 9 miles an hour, and respondent produced as witnesses two gripmen who testified that a cable car traveling at the usual rate of speed of 9 miles an hour could be stopped within 6 feet after applying the brakes; that inasmuch as the car in question proceeded approximately 65 feet after striking the child and before it was stopped, that it must necessarily have been traveling in excess of 15 miles an hour; one gripman estimated the speed at 20 miles an hour and the other at 25 or 30 miles an hour. This testimony was not refuted by other witnesses, neither the members of the car crew nor any one else having given testimony upon this subject; consequently, aside from matters developed upon cross-examination of these two gripmen, theirs was the only evidence in the case bearing upon the question of speed, and was sufficient in itself, if believed by the jury, to sustain its verdict upon that issue. Schneider v. Market Street Ry. Co., supra.

[6] Appellant, however, attacks the sufficiency of said testimony upon the grounds that respondent assumed, in all questions put to said witnesses, that the gripman of this car saw the child when the car was within two feet of him and that the brakes were immediately applied. In this respect, appellant claims that neither of those assumptions are warranted by the evidence, and argues that it is not permissible to assume, in the absence of all evidence, that the gripman saw or could have seen the child when the car was within two feet of him, and that even if he did, the suddenness of the emergency may have resulted in the intervention of two or three seconds between the appearance of the child and the application of the brakes; that traveling down a 5 per cent. grade at 15 miles per hour, or 22 feet a second, the car would cover nearly 66 feet in the slight interval before the brakes were applied. It is obvious, we think, from the evidence narrated that a substantial conflict is presented on this point, and, therefore, the question of whether the testimony of these two gripmen given on direct examination, as to the estimated rate of the speed of this car, should be accepted or whether the effect thereof was, as appellant argues, totally destroyed, were matters upon which the jury's determination is controlling.

[7] "Said municipal ordinance further provides that a bell or gong upon the car shall be rung or sounded, when approaching an intersecting street. The five school girls, who witnessed the accident, were on the sidewalk approximately 40 feet from the intersection where, if the ordinance had been complied with, the bell would have been sounded, and they testified that they heard no bell rung or any other warning given by the car. There were no witnesses produced to testify that the bell was rung or the gong sounded. Appellant contends that this negative testimony, even if admissible, cannot be said to rise to the dignity of substantial evidence sufficient, in and of itself, to support a finding that no bell was rung. In answer thereto it is sufficient to say that the weight to be given to negative testimony often arises in railroad and other accident cases where it is claimed that signals were not given, and that in such cases, the question is purely for the jury, and it has frequently been held that negative evidence of this character is sufficient to sustain a verdict (Jones on Evidence, [Horwitz] § 893, p. 400), even though it conflict with other evidence to the effect that a warning was actually given. Thompson v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 P. 709.

[8] "The question of whether or not there was a failure on the part of the gripman to look ahead, so as to observe what was before him on the street, was also one for the jury. The evidence in this regard shows that the accident occurred in the middle of the day, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, on a straight stretch of street, and where there was no traffic at the time in that immediate vicinity. Under those circumstances, we believe the jury might well conclude that the gripman failed in his duty, to observe the conditions of and the objects in the street ahead of him.

[9] "Regarding the issue of proximate cause, appellant contends that, even if it be conceded that the respondent has proved any one of the three acts of negligence relied upon, the evidence nevertheless fails to show that any of those acts contributed in any way to the death of respondent's child. There is no merit in this point. Manifestly, if appellant be guilty of the three elements of negligence above mentioned—and in view of the verdict in favor of the respondent, we must assume that it was—the jury was entitled to infer therefrom that such negligence proximately caused the injuries to and the subsequent death of said child. Direct evidence of proximate cause is not essential. The jury's finding may be founded upon an inference (Szopieray v. West Berkeley Express & Draying Co., 194 Cal. 106, 227 P. 720) which is defined to be 'a deduction which the reason of the jury makes from the facts proved.' Code of Civil Procedure, § 1958. The inference must, of course, be founded 'on a fact legally proved; and, on such a deduction from that fact as is warranted by a consideration of the usual propensities or passions of men, the particular propensities or passions of the person whose act is in question, the course of business, or the course of nature.' Code of Civil Procedure, § 1960; County of Alameda v. Tieslau, 44 Cal. App. 332, 186 P. 398.

The situation here is similar to the one presented in Szopieray v. West Berkeley Express & Draying Co., supra. There a child was injured in the street, apparently by being run over by some kind of vehicle. The defendant's truck, to which was attached two horses, had been left standing, with the horses unhitched, in violation of the municipal ordinance, in the street near the scene of the accident; but there were no eyewitnesses to the accident, and the defendant denied in its answer that the boy had in fact been injured by its horses and truck. Plaintiff's case rested entirely upon circumstantial evidence. The trial court refused to allow in evidence the municipal ordinance, which required horses standing on the public streets to be hitched, upon the theory that there was no proof offered to show that a violation of said ordinance had been the proximate cause of the injuries to said child, and a motion for a judgment of nonsuit was granted upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove, as against the defendant, any negligent act. Upon appeal, the judgment of nonsuit was reversed. In reference to the circumstantial evidence the court said: 'It is true there is no direct evidence that the truck moved and that such movement was the cause of the injury. In our view, however, there is sufficient indirect evidence tending to show that the proximate cause of the accident was the passing of the truck over the child.' And concerning the inferences which may be drawn from facts proved the court held: 'While the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged, yet, where the evidence is such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, it is a sufficient answer to a motion for a nonsuit.' Regarding the admissibility of the municipal ordinance the opinion reads: 'It is claimed in respondent's brief it was not shown that the violation of the ordinance was the proximate cause of the accident. But, if the ordinance had been received in evidence, it cannot be said the jury might not have found that the violation thereof contributed to the proximate cause of the injury.' (Italics ours.) True, in the instant case the question of the sufficiency of the evidence arises upon the appeal from the judgment upon the merits after verdict for plaintiff, and not upon judgment of nonsuit, but the facts and the law come before us in substantially the same manner as if a judgment of nonsuit were involved, and consequently the same rule prevails. In conclusion upon this branch of the case, it may be further stated that the case at bar is much stronger against this defendant than was the case against that defendant there, because here there is no question about the injuries to the child having been inflicted by the defendant.

[10] "The last contention made by appellant is, we think, the most serious one presented. It relates to the alleged misconduct of respondent's counsel. At the close of plaintiff's case, defendant called two witnesses and then rested, without calling the gripman who had operated the cable car at the time of the accident. Respondent's counsel, in the presence of the jury, then inquired of opposing counsel, 'Where is the car man?' to which appellant's counsel replied that he had no idea 'at the present time' and that he was not going to produce him. Respondent's counsel then said: 'He was in court yesterday.' This remark was assigned as misconduct and the jury, upon appellant's request, was instructed to disregard the same. Respondent's counsel then asked for and was granted a few minutes recess, after which the following colloquy took place: 'Mr. Ryan (counsel for respondent): Now, if your honor please, in reference to the gripman, since he is not called and not here to-day, and not in court at the present time, I will now consent that Mr. Partridge may read his testimony taken at the last trial. Mr. Partridge: I decline to do so, and it is not admissible, because the motorman is within the jurisdiction; and I assign the offer to read it as misconduct. The Court: Let the jury disregard the remarks of counsel on either side.' Thereafter, at the afternoon session the following proceedings occurred: 'Mr. Ryan: Well, will you take the stand, Mr. Partridge. * * * Q. You know Paul Joafus, the motorman? Mr. Partridge: I object to the question as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Mr. Ryan: It is preliminary, if your honor please. The Court: Objection sustained. Mr. Ryan: Q. And do you know that the— This is for the purpose of showing willful suppression, if your honor please, of evidence; that is the purpose of it. It is quite competent, I think. The Court: Proceed. Mr. Ryan: Q. I will ask you again, with his honor's permission, if you know Mr. Paul Joafus, the motorman who had charge of the car that ran into and killed the Keena boy? Mr. Partridge: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Mr. Ryan: For the purpose of showing willful suppression. Mr. Partridge: Anybody has a right, if your honor please, to produce the witness in court. Mr. Ryan: I disagree with you, if your honor please. The Court: The court is prepared to rule. Objection is sustained. Mr. Ryan: Yes, your honor. Mr. Ryan: Do you know whether or not the gripman on that car was in the hallway here yesterday? Mr. Partridge: I object to that as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. Mr. Ryan: This is for the same purpose, to show willful suppression, if your honor please. The Court: Objection sustained. Mr. Ryan: Did you discharge the witness? Mr. Partridge: I object to it upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial.' Respondent then called a Mr. Callahan as a witness, and proved by him that he had seen Joafus that morning, in a restaurant then being operated by Joafus, at Third and Bryant streets, San Francisco.

[11] "We think there can be little doubt of the impropriety of the course followed by respondent's counsel concerning the absence of this witness. Obviously there was no duty imposed upon appellant to call this or any other particular witness. McEwen v. New York Life Ins. Co., 187 Cal. 144, 201 P. 577. While the rule is well settled that when the evidence tends to prove a material fact which imposes a liability on a party, and he has it in his power to produce evidence which from its very nature must overthrow the case made against him, if it is not founded on fact, and he refuses to produce such evidence, the presumption arises that the evidence, if produced, would operate to his prejudice and support the case of his adversary (Alloggi v. S. P. Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 P. 1117), still the failure to call such witness does not amount to a willful suppression of evidence, as was strongly indicated by respondent's counsel in the instant case. Furthermore, counsel's conduct in persistently pursuing the inquiry and making said charges of willful suppression of evidence, while appellant's counsel was on the witness stand, after the court had repeatedly ruled that the subject of the inquiry was not proper, is clearly subject to criticism."

[12] Up to this point, in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, we are in accord, at least, with the conclusions therein reached on the several principles of law as well as with the statement of the facts applicable hereto and involved in the action. It is as to the last question only in the case, that is to say, the effect of the misconduct of counsel for plaintiff with which this court is in disagreement with the final conclusion expressed thereon by the District Court of Appeal.

The evidence bearing upon the question of the legal responsibility of the defendant for the death of the infant son of the plaintiff was manifestly very weak and unsatisfactory. The verdict of the jury might well have been in favor of the defendant. Nevertheless, in itself and in the absence of prejudicial error "the record reveals evidence sufficiently substantial to support the verdict." What the verdict would have been without the suggestions of counsel for plaintiff is, of course, impossible of infallible ascertainment, but in view of the fact that the decision by the jury, resting, as it did, primarily upon indifferent evidence, may have been and in all probability was largely influenced and possibly absolutely controlled by the innuendoes speaking to the wrongdoing of the defendant in concealing facts which should have been placed by it within the knowledge of the jury, it is clearly unfair and unjust to the defendant that it be mulcted in damages where the misconduct by counsel for the plaintiff was presumably so large a factor in the verdict. Cavanagh v. Township of Riverside, 136 Mich. 660, 99 N. W. 876; Jordan v. Austin, 161 Ala. 585, 50 So. 70; Sanger v. McDonald, 82 Ark. 432, 102 S. W. 690; Sandberg v. Chicago Rys. Co., 191 Ill. App. 199; Gulf C. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Sullivan (Tex.

Civ. App.) 178 S. W. 615; Devries v. Phillips, 63 N. C. 53; Bendetson v. Moody, 100 Mich. 553, 59 N. W. 252.

In the dissenting opinion of Justices Olney, Wilbur, and Lennon in the case of Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 728, 192 P. 538, 541, where prejudicial misconduct was charged to the same attorney who represented plaintiff and who now represents respondent herein, it was aptly said:

"It seems to us that an entirely false quantity was injected into the case by plaintiff's counsel, over the repeated admonitions of the court, and that the false quantity so introduced was of a character so prejudicial to the defendant as to have prevented the jury from considering the case fairly upon its real merits. To sustain the verdict under these circumstances will, it seems to us, have the effect of encouraging similar conduct in other cases, when it should be discouraged strongly."

Judged from a reading of the record herein, and taking into consideration the fact that a recess of several hours was taken by the court between the announcement by counsel representing the defendant that it rested its case, and the reconvening of the trial court, the conduct of counsel for plaintiff in repeatedly charging the defendant with a "willful suppression of evidence" was not induced by any possible temperamental emotion of the attorney, or by reason of hasty action or untoward thoughtlessness on his part, but, to the contrary, was undoubtedly the result of premeditation and deliberation.

It will be observed that the misconduct consisted, not in a single utterance of the charge, but rather embraced iteration and reiteration thereof, and included hints, suggestions, and insinuations to such an extent that by no possibility could the meaning of counsel have been misinterpreted or misunderstood by the members of the jury. It is altogether too evident that the purpose of the accusation that evidence had been willfully suppressed by the defendant was none other than to bolster up a weak case by creating a prejudice against the defendant in the minds of the members of the jury. Such means of winning a lawsuit cannot be commended nor receive recognition and indorsement by this court, instituted and maintained, as it is, on the principle of administering justice.

The judgment is reversed solely on the ground that the misconduct of the attorney for plaintiff prejudicially and materially affected the substantial rights of the defendant and prevented it from having a fair trial.

We concur: WASTE, J.; RICHARDS, J.; LENNON, J.; SHENK, J.

LAWLOR, Acting C. J. I dissent. First, as to the merits of the assignment of misconduct, it may be true, as counsel for respondent apparently assumed, that, for strategic purposes, appellant kept the gripman in attendance on the trial during the presentation of respondent's case in chief in order to convey the impression he would be called to testify for appellant, when there was in fact no such intention. But even if this were so, such tactics would not constitute a suppression of evidence under the rule. Subdivisions 6 and 7, § 2061, Code Civ. Proc. The gripman had primary knowledge of the accident and, being an employee of appellant, perhaps the failure to make him a witness might have been the proper subject of comment in the argument to the jury on behalf of respondent, but not upon the theory of a suppression of evidence. Now, the only testimony offered by appellant was that of the father of the child that there was an 18x18 yard back of the family residence, which testimony was apparently offered to show contributory negligence on the part of respondent in allowing the child to play on the street; and the testimony of appellant's claims agent that the extrajudicial statements of a witness for respondent were contradictory of her testimony. It is plain, therefore, that neither of these items of testimony involved the principle laid down in section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, and it must therefore be conceded that repeatedly charging appellant with having suppressed evidence, in disregard of the adverse rulings on the question, constituted misconduct.

This brings me to the further question whether, under the constitutional provision, such misconduct demands a reversal of the judgment. Two juries have found that respondent is entitled to recover. Twice the trial court has held the evidence was sufficient to sustain the verdicts. The District Court of Appeal and the majority opinion herein have declared the evidence is sufficient as matter of law to support the judgment. Due to an erroneous hypothetical instruction, which omitted the issue of contributory negligence, the first judgment was reversed. So that neither in the trial court nor on appeal has it ever been held that respondent is not entitled to recover.

It seems to me the probabilities are opposed to the theory that appellant was prejudiced by the misconduct. Both the trial court and the District Court of Appeal have held that the jury was not influenced against appellant by the incident. It is evident that this court is not in as favorable a position as the trial court to satisfactorily appraise the effect of the misconduct. The prompt action of the trial judge to avoid any injurious result indicates that something more than a perfunctory consideration was given to the misconduct of counsel. What was said in Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 724, 192 P. 538, 540, is to my mind equally pertinent here:

"In doing this the court must be deemed to have concluded that no prejudice was suffered by defendant by reason of any of the matters to which we have referred. Conceding some of the statements made by counsel, whatever the provocation thought by him to exist therefor, were improper, we are satisfied that this conclusion of the trial judge should not be disturbed by an appellate court. The trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct as we have here, and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong. This, we think, may not fairly be said here."

All presumptions are in favor of the regularity of the action of the court below. Prejudice is no longer presumed from error, but under the constitutional mandate the party complaining must assume the burden of satisfying the appellate court that to affirm the judgment would work a miscarriage of justice. This appellant has not done.

Formerly any departure from prescribed rules of evidence or procedure might be made the basis of a reversal, but now a miscarriage of justice must be established as a fact and in the process of determining the question the appellate court must examine the record and to some extent weigh the evidence and form conclusions upon its weight—a function heretofore reserved exclusively for the jury. It is not enough to argue that the jury may have been influenced by the misconduct to the prejudice of appellant; the showing must be such that an inference of injury finds clear support in the record on appeal. At most, the question here is involved in pure speculation. In my opinion it is more likely that if the persistent misconduct of counsel in opposition to the repeated rulings of the court sustaining appellant's objections influenced the jury at all, respondent and not appellant suffered thereby. I cannot escape the conviction that to hold otherwise is to impugn the jury system itself, for such a conclusion necessarily involves an assumption that the jury ignored the rulings of the court, and accepted the ipse dixit of counsel, who misconceived the law or may have resorted to partisan or improper methods in the effort to win his case. The probability is that the action of counsel was reprehended by the jury, for the court admonished them to "pay no attention to the remarks of counsel, and they will not be considered by the jury for any purpose in this case. It is not evidence. Let the jury disregard the remarks of counsel on either side." In its charge the court likewise instructed the jury "to distinguish carefully between the facts testified to by the witnesses and the statements made by the attorneys in their arguments. * * *"

If my estimate of the actual effect of counsel's misconduct is well founded, then a case of genuine hardship is presented. Respondent has lost his child. The accident occurred on May 9, 1918, more than seven years ago. The purpose of the reversal is to discipline counsel and discourage improper conduct in the trial of cases; but, unhappily, the effect is to penalize an innocent litigant. This is the second reversal in the case and a third trial should be avoided.

SEAWELL, J. (dissenting). I am in accord with the reasoning of Mr. Justice LAWLOR which leads to the conclusion that it is not probable that the conduct of counsel, as complained of, was so powerful in its effect as to overmaster the minds of the members of the jury and produce a result that would not have been produced but for the conduct assigned as prejudicial error. The main opinion seems to concede the question that there would have been an affirmance of the case but for the conduct as set out in the opinion. In the instant case, there seems to be no justification for the course taken by respondent's attorney. Appellant was under no legal obligation to call the gripman to the witness chair. The testimony of the gripman was equally available to both parties, and by the failure or refusal of either to exercise the right of making him a witness no room was left for complaint or criticism by either party. The situation did not present a case of suppression of evidence. Where an attorney in the trial of a cause does not exercise his right to examine a certain person as a witness, which person is available to either party, on the theory that his adversary will necessarily be forced to call such witness, and he will thereby gain such advantages as the rules of cross-examination afford, and thereafter finds himself disappointed by the failure of his adversary to call such witness, he will not be permitted to indulge in insinuations which may impugn the motives of his adversary who was acting fully within his legal right. Admitting improper conduct on the part of respondent's counsel, I am not prepared to say that it worked a miscarriage of justice.

The alleged misconduct of counsel in the trial of causes is frequently before this court for review. The orderly conduct of causes is so completely under the control of the trial judge that it ought not to be, except upon rare occasions, necessary to bring that issue to the attention of this court. In other words, ordinarily, it is within the power of the trial court to completely neutralize, by prompt and vigorous action, the prejudicial effect which it was the intention of the transgressor to produce. The admonition of the trial court, if firmly and promptly made, will, as a rule, so effectually remove all evil effects as to leave little reason to make the conduct of counsel a serious problem here. This should be done in every instance. If in the judgment of the trial court, however, this was practically impossible of attainment, then, of course, a new trial should have been ordered. But the trial court did not so regard it. The facts of the instant case are such that the judgment of the superior court would have been sustainable under either view of the situation. For the reasons herein suggested, I am of the view that the judgment may properly be affirmed.

STANDARD VARNISH WORKS et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 11477.)

1. Master and servant ⟸417(7)—Commission's finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

Industrial Accident Commission's implied finding on conflicting evidence, that employment of one, for whose death compensation was awarded on basis of wages received at time of death, was permanent, is conclusive on Supreme Court, under St. 1917, p. 876, § 67, subd. c.

2. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Award fixing anticipated earnings on basis of wages received at time of death held not error.

Award fixing anticipated annual earnings of minor employee at rate based on wages received by him at time of death in employment during school vacation held not erroneous, under St. 1917, p. 842, § 12, subd. a, under conflicting evidence as to whether he intended to return to school.

3. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Amount of earnings used in support of minor employee deducted in fixing compensation for death.

Deduction of amount of earnings, used in support of minor employee in fixing award of compensation for his death to partial dependent, is proper and necessary.

4. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Earnings from former employer may be considered in computing compensation for death.

Amount of average annual earnings devoted by deceased minor employee to support of his mother having been determined by deduction of amount of earnings used in his own support, employer and insurance carrier cannot complain because earnings from former employer were considered in computing amount of such contribution.

5. Master and servant ⟸386(1)—Earnings from dissimilar employments may be considered in computing compensation for death.

Under St. 1917, p. 840, § 9, subd. c (2), partial dependent of deceased minor employee is entitled to death benefit of three times annual amount devoted by deceased to support of such dependent, though two employments from which earnings were received during year were dissimilar.

6. Courts ⟸90(4)—Statutory construction not since changed by Legislature adhered to.

Legislature not having amended St. 1917, p. 840, § 9, subd. c (2), since its construction by the court as making amount devoted to dependent by deceased employee measure of award of compensation and imposing full burden on death-causing employment, court will not place different construction thereon.

Application by the Standard Varnish Works, employer, and the State Compensation Insurance Fund, insurer, for certiorari to review an award of compensation by the Industrial Accident Commission to Adeline Minderman, claimant, for the death of Richard W. Minderman, employee. Award affirmed.

Frank J. Creede, B. E. Pemberton, Thos. W. Slaven, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

John R. Jones, of San Francisco, for respondent Minderman.

SHENK, J. The purpose of this proceeding is to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. Richard W. Minderman, a minor of the age of 16 years, was employed on July 2, 1924, as assistant shipping clerk by the petitioner, Standard Varnish Works, a corporation. The petitioner, State Compensation Insurance Fund, is the insurance carrier. About three weeks after the employment began, the young man was killed in an elevator accident. It is conceded that the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment. At the time of his death, he was receiving wages from said corporation at the rate of $15 a week. During the period of said employment, he was and had been for more than a year prior thereto employed at night as a messenger by the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company. From the latter employment, he received an average of $33.93 a month and a small additional amount by way of tips. All of his earnings were turned over to his mother, Adeline Minderman, who used the same with other sources of family income for the general family living expenses, including the maintenance of the deceased. The members of the family at the time of the death of deceased were the mother, a brother, a sister, and himself, all contributing to the family income. The mother applied to the respondent commission for an award on account of partial dependency. After proceedings duly taken in that behalf, the commission found that the mother was partially dependent on the deceased for support, that the annual contribution of the deceased toward her support, after certain deductions, was $741, and made an award in her favor as a death benefit in the sum of $2,123, payable in weekly installments of $9.26.

[1] Two points are made by the petitioners. It is first contended that the award was erroneous because the "average annual earnings" of the deceased were not arrived at as contemplated by the statute (section 12 [a], Stats. 1917, p. 842). It appears that the deceased had just completed his second year as a student at the Lick-Wilmerding High School in San Francisco. During his attendance at that school, he was working out of school hours for the telephone company. When the vacation period arrived in June, 1924, he sought and obtained employment with the petitioner, Standard Varnish Works. The respondent commission based the amount of its award on the wages received by the deceased at the time of his death, fixing the anticipated earnings of the minor for the year following at the rate of $15 a week. It is earnestly insisted that by the method thus employed the anticipated earnings were not correctly or properly measured, especially since the employment of the deceased, according to the petitioners' construction of the evidence, was for the vacation period only. Assuming, for the purposes of this case only, that the alleged temporary character of the employment might have significance in the commission's determination, it is enough to say that the evidence favorable to the respondents is susceptible of the construction that the employment would continue beyond the vacation period. True, there was evidence that the deceased intended to return to school after vacation, but there was also the testimony of the mother that the question of whether or not her son would relinquish his employment and return to school was undecided. It may fairly be said that there was a substantial conflict in the evidence as to whether the employment was temporary or permanent. The implied finding of the commission on that point is, therefore, conclusive on this court (section 67[c], Stats. 1917, p. 876).

[2] It is unnecessary to discuss at length the theory on which the commission fixed the earnings as of the time of the death of the deceased and the proper construction of the statute in that regard. That question was the subject of recent consideration by this court, and in reviewing prior determinations was decided adversely to the petitioners' contentions. Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm. (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 662. See, also, Spreckels Sugar Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 256, 199 P. 8; Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 191 Cal. 724, 218 P. 1009; Market St. R. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 193 Cal. 178, 224 P. 95.

[3] The second contention is based on the fact that the evidence shows, without conflict, that while the deceased turned over his entire earnings to his mother a portion thereof was used for his own support. The record discloses that the commission took into consideration the proportion of the total earnings of the minor used in his own support and made deduction accordingly. In this case, the amount of the deduction happened to be approximately the amount that the young man was receiving from the telephone company. Under this state of the facts, it is insisted that, owing to the contribution of the total earnings of the deceased to a common fund, it was impossible to determine whether the earnings from the telephone company or the earnings from the Varnish Works were wholly used by the mother for her own support, and that the earnings from each source should have been taken into consideration with a proportional deduction from the amount of the award charged against the petitioners. The contention is that, if the course suggested be not followed, the petitioners are called upon to pay an award without deduction on account of the minor's own support. It is settled that the deduction of an amount equivalent to the sum used in the minor's own support is proper and necessary. Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 517, 199 P. 796; Great Western Power Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra.

[4] This deduction was made, and the result was to properly measure the amount of the average annual earnings devoted by the deceased to the support of his mother. When that amount has been determined, the petitioners cannot be heard to complain because the earnings from a coemployer were taken into consideration in computing the amount of such contribution. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390.

[5, 6] It is urged that the two employments of the deceased were dissimilar and that, therefore, the rule laid down in the last case cited should not apply. The commission was required, under the statute, to award "a death benefit, which shall amount to three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent." Section 9 (c) (2), Stats. 1917, p. 840. We find no sound basis for a distinction between employments which are similar and those which are dissimilar. The apparent hardship which is imposed on the employer, in whose service the deceased was engaged at the time of his death, exists as much in the one case as in the other. It is readily apparent that the construction placed on the statute in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, makes the amount devoted to the dependent the measure of the award and imposes the full burden on the death-causing employment. Whatever perplexities might attend the solution of the problem, if it were a new one, we are not disposed to place a different construction on the statute at this time. The case of Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, was decided in March, 1916, and during the intervening years the Legislature has not seen fit to change the rule by statutory provision.

POWERS v. RAYMOND. (L. A. 8135.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1925.)

1. Negligence ⟸121(2)—Presumption of negligence held not raised.

Mere fact of injury by fall, caused by defective boardwalk through grounds of defendant's hotel, held not to raise presumption of negligence under circumstances shown.

2. Negligence ⟸136(7)—Question for court and jury on evidence.

Whether negligence can be inferred from evidence is question of law for court, but whether it should be inferred is question for jury.

3. Master and servant ⟸88(1)—One injured before employment began held not employee at time.

One injured on hotel grounds before employment in hotel began was not employee at time of injury, which therefore did not arise out of or in course of employment, though she was residing in hotel at owner's invitation.

4. Master and servant ⟸89(1)—Master not bound to protect employee on private excursion outside place of work.

Employer's duty toward employee is limited to furnishing reasonably safe place to work, with proper facilities for ingress and egress, and does not extend to her protection while on private excursion outside such place.

5. Innkeepers ⟸8—One residing in hotel before employment therein began held not guest.

One residing in hotel at owner's invitation before employment therein began held not a guest, entitled to recover for injuries sustained during such time because of defective boardwalk through hotel grounds.

6. Negligence ⟸32(3)—Invitee not within scope of invitation is mere licensee.

Hotel owner, within scope of his invitation to occupy room and use premises before beginning of invitee's employment therein, was obliged to exercise ordinary care for her safety, which included duty to maintain premises in reasonably safe condition, but if her occupancy and use of portion of premises on which injured was not within scope of invitation, she was mere licensee, to whom owner owed no duty except to abstain from willful or wanton injury.

7. Negligence ⟸32(3)—Resident of hotel pending commencement of employment therein held not impliedly invited to use dark pathway through grounds.

One to whom hotel accommodations were extended, pending commencement of her employment therein when hotel was opened to public, was entitled to make such use of building and premises as was reasonably necessary for her comfort and convenience while they were being made ready for accommodation of guests, but was not impliedly invited to enter and use dark pathway through grounds to railroad station, where owner provided safe and lighted roadway to such station.

8. Negligence ⟸52—Hotel owner held not bound to place warning sign at entrance to dark bypath through grounds.

Hotel owner held to owe no duty to one extended accommodations of hotel, pending commencement of her employment therein when opened to public, to place warning sign or obstruction at entrance of dark bypath through hotel grounds to railroad station, impenetrable darkness being sufficient warning.

9. Negligence ⟸32(2)—Hotel owner not bound to keep dark pathway through grounds in repair for safety of licensee.

One extended accommodations of hotel pending commencement of her employment therein being mere licensee until such time, it was not duty of hotel owner to keep dark pathway through grounds, parallel to well-lighted roadway, in repair for her accommodation and safety.

10. Negligence ⟸71—One using dark pathway instead of well-lighted way held negligent.

One who had never used and did not know of dark pathway through grounds of hotel, in which she was residing pending commencement to employment therein, held contributorily negligent as matter of law in using such pathway instead of well-lighted roadway parallel thereto.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John Perry Wood, Judge.

Action by Anna M. Powers against Walter Raymond. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard L. Riccardi and Ticknor, Carter & Webster, all of Pasadena, for appellant.

G. A. Gibbs and Elliot Gibbs, both of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHENK, J. Action for damages for alleged negligence of the defendant. From a judgment on a directed verdict in favor of the defendant, the plaintiff appeals.

The defendant is the owner and proprietor of the Raymond Hotel in Pasadena. The hotel and grounds surrounding the same and used in connection therewith occupy about 80 acres of land. In the vicinity of the hotel buildings are roadways leading to and from public highways to the north and west.

The roadway to the north runs toward the Raymond Hotel station of the Santa Fé Railway, extending a distance of about 300 feet through the hotel grounds. The remaining distance from the hotel grounds to the station is for pedestrian and vehicular traffic by way of a city street. Paralleling the northerly roadway, and about 50 feet easterly therefrom, is a narrow pathway maintained for the use of the guests of the hotel during the season when the hotel is in operation. For a certain distance in this pathway, at the time of the injury complained of, three 12 inch boards were laid side by side lengthwise the walk. The regular hotel season for the year of 1922–23 opened on December 28, 1922, and closed on April 12, 1923. By special arrangement, however, the accommodations of the hotel were made available to an Eastern football team from December 24th to and including the 1st day of January following, but the hotel was not open to the public until December 28th.

Prior to December 21st the plaintiff had been living in Denver. She had been engaged by the defendant to serve as a waitress at the hotel but upon learning that she was an experienced hairdresser and manicurist and desiring to obtain the services of some one to act in that capacity, the defendant entered into a contract with her to take charge of the hairdressing department during the forthcoming season. Under the terms of the contract she was to receive as her compensation 65 per cent. of the gross receipts from her department and her board and room. She was notified that if the football team were to be entertained at the hotel it would be agreeable to the defendant to have her present and presumably ready for duty on December 22d or 23d. By telegraphic message she agreed to start from Denver on the 22d. However, she arrived in Pasadena on the 21st, went immediately to the hotel and was assigned to her room. Certain persons who had been engaged to serve in various capacities during the hotel season in question and who were friends of the plaintiff were expected to arrive from the east on the evening train of the 22d. The train was late, and did not arrive until 11.26 p. m. In company with two of her friends who had also been engaged to act as employees of the defendant, the plaintiff left the hotel about 11 o'clock on the night of the 22d for the purpose of meeting the incoming train. This she did of her own volition, and in nowise at the direction or suggestion of the defendant, nor as a part of her contract of employment either present or prospective.

The main roadway through the hotel grounds toward the station was easily and safely traversable, and had been well lighted for the particular accommodation of those who were to arrive on said train. The parallel pathway was unlighted, and it was impossible for any one passing along the same in the darkness at that time of night to discern whether or not it was passable. This condition attending the pathway was observed by the plaintiff at the time. The lighted roadway was also plainly observable. The pathway was unlighted because it was not then in use, was under repair and was not to be used until the regular season opened. Instead of following the main well-lighted roadway, the plaintiff entered the dark pathway. She testified that in proceeding along the same she "couldn't see at all because it was so dark." She said she took the pathway at the suggestion of her companions, who she understood, had used the same before. No question of their negligence in making the suggestion nor of the responsibility of the defendant because of their action in that behalf is here raised. After the plaintiff had proceeded a short distance along the dark pathway her "foot went into a big hole," which may be assumed to have been a defective portion of the boardwalk. She fell and suffered a severe injury to her knee. The defendant paid the plaintiff's bills for hospital service and medical attention and provided for her care for several months and until she was able to move about. It was for pain and suffering and alleged permanent disability that this action was brought.

[1, 2] The foregoing facts were undisputed and constituted the evidence upon which any judgment in favor of the plaintiff would depend. On those facts two questions present themselves for consideration: First, was the defendant guilty of negligence toward the plaintiff at the time of the injury? and, second, if such negligence was shown, was the plaintiff guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law? As bearing on the first question it may be said that the mere fact of the injury under the circumstances here shown did not raise a presumption of negligence. Depons v. Ariss, 182 Cal. 485, 188 P. 797; Sappenfield v. Main Street, etc., R. R. Co., 91 Cal. 48, 27 P. 590; 19 Cal. Jur. 707. Whether negligence can be inferred from the evidence is a question of law for the determination of the court, but whether it ought to be inferred is a question for the jury. Pacheco v. Judson Mfg. Co., 113 Cal. 541, 45 P. 833; 19 Cal. Jur. 724.

[3] The extent of the responsibility of the defendant toward the plaintiff depends on their relationship at the time of the injury. There is much discussion in the briefs as to whether the plaintiff at that time was an employee, a guest, an invitee or a mere licensee, the plaintiff contending that she was an employee and guest, and the defendant contending that she was a mere licensee. It is alleged in the complaint "that the plaintiff entered into the employ of the said defendant, and at the invitation of the defendant took up her residence on the premises on the 21st day of December, 1922." It is not alleged that she was an employee of the defendant at the time of the injury, and the proof clearly shows that she did not bear that relationship to the defendant at that time. She arrived at the hotel in advance of the time when she agreed to arrive, and the term of her employment had not yet commenced. The payroll was not started until some days thereafter.

[4] It is not claimed and of course could not properly be asserted that, under the evidence, the accident arose out of or in the course of the alleged employment. But assuming, as the plaintiff claims the evidence discloses, that she was an employee of the defendant at the time of the injury, then the duty of the defendant to her was limited to furnishing her a reasonably safe place in which to perform her duties, with proper facilities for ingress and egress, and did not extend to her protection while she was on a private excursion outside of those limits and taken solely on her own account. Kennedy v. Chase, 119 Cal. 637; 52 P. 33, 63 Am. St. Rep. 153; Jacobson v. Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co., 175 Cal. 468, 166 P. 3.

[5, 6] It is not alleged that the plaintiff was a guest at the particular time in question, and under the evidence it may not rightly be said that she was a guest at that time. Fay v. Pacific Imp. Co., 93 Cal. 253, 26 P. 1099, 28 P. 943, 16 L. R. A. 188, 27 Am. St. Rep. 198; Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462; 14 Cal. Jur. 319; 32 C. J. 533. The proof was directly responsive to the allegation in the amended complaint, namely, that the plaintiff took up her residence on said premises on December 21st at the invitation of the defendant. The allegation was in conformity with the facts as developed during the course of the trial. The question is therefore narrowed to this: What was the scope of the invitation extended by the defendant to the plaintiff to occupy the premises at the particular time? For within the scope of that invitation the defendant was obliged to exercise ordinary care for her safety. This would include the duty to maintain the premises on which the plaintiff was expressly or impliedly invited in a reasonably safe condition. Giannini v. Campodonico, 176 Cal. 548, 169 P. 80. But when it was made to appear that the occupancy and use of the portion of the premises on which the plaintiff was injured could not under any rational view of the evidence be within the scope of the invitation, she became a mere licensee, to whom the defendant owed no duty except to abstain from willful or wanton injury. Means v. Southern California Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 P. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206; Giannini v. Campodonico, supra; 16 Cal. Jur. 282, and cases cited.

[7] When the evidence before us is viewed in a light most favorable to the plaintiff, it cannot be said that she was invited either expressly or impliedly to enter and use the dark pathway on the night in question. Upon her arrival the accommodations of the hotel for her board and room were extended to her in anticipation of and pending the commencement of her service as an employee. Such accommodations would no doubt include such use of the building and premises as would be reasonably necessary for the comfort and convenience of herself and others similarly situated during the period prior to the opening of the hotel to the public, and during the time when the hotel and premises were being made ready for the accommodation of guests. It may be granted that proper and safe means of ingress and egress to and from the railway station would be included in the accommodations which the defendant had invited the plaintiff to enjoy. These means were amply provided by the defendant by way of the admittedly safe and well-lighted roadway leading to the station, but the use of the unlighted bypath was not extended to the plaintiff under the circumstances here shown.

[8] Much stress is laid by the plaintiff on the claim that it was the duty of the defendant to place some sign or obstruction at the entrance of the dark bypath to warn those who might choose to enter, but we think the impenetrable darkness was in itself a sufficient warning, even to those who had used the path before, not to use the same except at their own risk.

[9, 10] Since we conclude that at the time of the injury the plaintiff was a mere licensee, there was therefore no duty on the part of the defendant to keep the said pathway in repair for her accommodation and safety. Furthermore, the evidence shows that the plaintiff was unfamiliar with the pathway, had never used it before, and, in fact, did not know that it existed. Under such circumstances, if it be assumed that negligence on the part of the defendant was shown, the conclusion would be impelled that the plaintiff was at the time guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Under any view of the evidence the action of the trial court in directing a verdict for the defendant should not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

STACEY BROS. GAS CONST. CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. SAME.

1. Master and servant ⟸417(7)—Findings of Industrial Accident Commission on evidence conclusive.

Findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are subject to review only in so far as they have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof.

2. Master and servant ⟸361—Essentials of relation of special employer and employee stated.

To establish legal relation of special employer and special employee, it must appear that, either by terms of contract or during course of its performance, employee of alleged independent contractor came under control and direction of other party to contract, and suffered injury as result of such direction and control.

3. Master and servant ⟸361—Test to determine whether employee is servant of original master or third party stated.

In determining whether an employee is servant of his original master, or of party to whom he has been furnished, test is whether in particular service which he is engaged to perform he continues to be liable to direction and control of his master, or becomes subject to that of party to whom he is lent or hired.

4. Master and servant ⟸405(2) — Evidence held to show lineman was under control of original master.

Evidence held to show that method of doing work in taking down derrick when lineman was killed was under direction and control of decedent's original master, through its general superintendent of linemen, and its foreman.

5. Master and servant ⟸361—Lineman held not special employee of contractor so as to render it liable for compensation for death.

Lineman, who while in employ of original master and as member of a linemen's crew was directed to dismantle a derrick erected by master at request of contractor, and who was at all times during course of work under direction and control of original master through its foreman, held not a special employee of contractor so as to render it liable for compensation for his death.

LENNON, J. Certiorari, directed to the Industrial Accident Commission, to review an award to Alma M. Smith and her children against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, for the death of her husband, A. E. Smith, who died from injuries sustained in and arising out of the course of his employment. The Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, the insurance carriers for the Stacey Bros. Gas Construction Company, and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, who are self-insurers, were both directed to pay the award. The Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, on behalf of the Stacey Bros. Gas Construction Company, and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, on its own behalf, are the petitioners for the writ. Both petitioners seek exemption from the liability imposed by the award of the Industrial Accident Commission, and claim that the Commission acted without and in excess of its power in entering the award against each of petitioners, respectively, in that the findings are not sustained by the evidence.

Generally stated, the facts as revealed by the record returned by the respondents are these: The Pacific Gas & Electric Company let a contract to the Stacey Bros. Gas Construction Company for the erection of a gas holder in the city of Santa Rosa. In the course of the construction of this gas holder it became necessary for the Stacey Company to erect a derrick in the center of said gas holder. The Stacey Company had neither the necessary tools nor the skilled labor required to do this part of the work, and the Pacific Gas & Electric Company was requested to furnish the necessary timbers and its pole construction crew to erect the derrick and remove same when its purpose had been accomplished. The Pacific Gas & Electric Company undertook to furnish the necessary poles, to erect them and remove them, charging the Stacey Company for the actual cost of the labor and the materials used and bill the same to them, less a credit for the value of the poles returned. The Pacific Gas & Electric Company have a printed form known as the "D & C Tag" (deliver and charge), which is used when the company performs construction work on request for its patrons or others, such as running power lines, which the company does not furnish in the ordinary course of its service. This tag is used by officials of the company in directing their foremen to do the work requested. It was customary for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company to do such work on request. It does not appear, however, that the particular crew of linemen directed to erect the derrick for the Stacey Company had ever before done this kind of work. The Pacific Gas & Electric Company superintendent gave one of the so-called "D & C tags" to the foreman of its linemen's crew, directing him to erect the derrick. This foreman reported with his crew at the place where the gas holder was being constructed and erected the derrick. The work was done, it appears from the record, under the direct supervision of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's foreman. There was no direction by the Stacey Company as to the method of doing the work, nor did the Stacey Company exercise any control over the crew of linemen employed in the doing of the work. There were, however, a few general directions given by McPeake, the superintendent of the Stacey Company, concerning where the poles were to be erected, the number of clamps to be used, and that the cable should be "dead ended" to insure the safety of the derrick. These suggestions were accepted by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's foreman, who directed the means of accomplishing the desired result. The method of erecting the poles and all the details incident thereto were under the complete control at all times during the course of the work, of said Pacific Gas & Electric Company's foreman.

When the construction work was almost completed so that there was no further need of the derrick, the Stacey Company notified the Pacific Gas & Electric Company to have the poles removed. By means of a similar "D & C tag," as was used in directing the foreman to erect the derrick, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company superintendent directed the foreman of the linemen's crew to dismantle the derrick. Under the direction of this foreman the said crew of linemen proceeded to take down the derrick. When the superintendent of the Stacey Company, McPeake, arrived and saw the dismantling in progress, he stopped the work for a few minutes, as he was not decided where the poles should be placed when this work should be accomplished. After conferring with his foreman, McPeake notified the Pacific Gas & Electric Company foreman to "go ahead" and complete the job. McPeake then left the scene where the dismantling of the derrick was taking place. He took no further part in this work. The work of dismantling, which had been commenced under the immediate supervision and control of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company foreman, was continued in the same manner without any interference by any one in behalf of the Stacey Company. The method of doing the work was left entirely to his discretion. During the course of the work of dismantling the derrick, Smith, the deceased, was killed. He was in the employ of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and was a member of the linemen's crew directed to dismantle the derrick. He was, at all times during the course of the work, under the direction and control of said company through its foreman.

The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission, material to the issues here presented, are: That at the time of his death the said A. E. Smith was employed by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, his general employer, and by the Stacey Bros. Gas Construction Company, his special employer; and that the injuries sustained occurred in the course of and arising out of his employment and caused his death. There is no dispute as to the correctness of the finding of the Commission that Smith's injuries were sustained in the course of and arising out of his employment.

Petitioner Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, on behalf of the Stacey Company, contends that the finding that the said company was the special employer of said Smith is not supported by the evidence. Respondent Industrial Accident Commission, in answer to this contention, urges that the arrangement between the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and the Stacey Company was a mere loan by the former of its men and materials to the latter for the latter's accommodation, and that the Stacey Company assumed such direct and immediate control and supervision over the linemen's crew as to establish the relation of special employer and special employee between it and said Smith. With this contention petitioner Pacific Gas & Electric Company concur, but endeavor to escape liability by interposing the contention that, inasmuch as the Stacey Company was a special employer, it should be held solely liable for the death of Smith.

[1] This contention seems to postulate the very issue in controversy, and is obviously predicated upon the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission of the special employment of Smith. Thus we are confronted, at the outset, by the question of whether or not the evidence adduced upon the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission warrants and supports the finding of the relation of special employer and special employee as between the Stacey Company and Smith, the deceased. Of course, it goes without saying that the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission are subject to review only in so far as they have been made without any evidence whatever in support thereof. Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 177 Cal. 378, 170 P. 822; Dearborn v. Industrial Acc. Com.,

187 Cal. 591, 203 P. 112; Pruitt v. Industrial Acc. Com., 189 Cal. 459, 209 P. 31. In short, if the facts show substantially without conflict that there is no evidence to support the finding, the Commission was without jurisdiction to make the same.

There must be some evidence upon which the finding of special employment is predicater sufficiently showing that there was an exercise of the right of direction to the employee by the alleged special employer as to the manner and method of doing the desired work based upon the latter's right of control not only of the work to be done but of the man or men employed in the doing of the work.

[2, 3] To establish the legal relation of special employer and special employee it must appear that either by the terms of the contract or during the course of its performance the employee of the alleged independent contractor came under the control and direction of the other party to the contract, and suffered injury as the result of such direction and control. Famous Players Lasky Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 194 Cal. 134, 228 P. 5, 34 A. L. R. 765; Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 179 Cal. 432, 177 P. 273; Pruitt v. Industrial Acc. Com., 189 Cal. 459, 209 P. 31; Federal Insurance Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 190 Cal. 97, 210 P. 628. And when determining whether, in any given case, an employee is the servant of his original master or of a party to whom he has been furnished, "the test is whether, in the particular service which he is engaged to perform, he continues liable to the direction and control of his master or becomes subject to that of the party to whom he is lent or hired." Coughlan v. Cambridge, 166 Mass. 268, 44 N. E. 218; Scribner's Case, 231 Mass. 132, 120 N. E. 350, 3 A. L. R. 1178; Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra. Shortly stated, the real test of what constitutes special employment may be said to be found in the character of the control and supervision exercised by the alleged special employer over the work and the employee engaged in the doing of the same.

The Pacific Gas & Electric Company undoubtedly was the general employer of Smith, the deceased, at the time of his death. It had hired Smith in the first instance and was paying his wages at the time he was engaged in assisting in the work of erecting the derrick. It had sent him with other members of its crew of linemen under the direction and control of its own foreman to do a particular piece of work which it had engaged to do for the Stacey Company. There was no contract of employment, express or implied, between the Stacey Company and Smith. True it is the superintendent of the Stacey Company, at the inception of the work, indicated to the foreman of the crew of linemen what was to be done. Beyond this he did not go, and aside from this there is no evidence that he ever attempted to control or assume control of the progress and completion of the work or of the men employed to do the same. This control, the evidence shows, was vested entirely in the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's foreman. The members of the linemen's crew, so far as the work of erecting the derrick was concerned, were at all times and in all respects under the immediate supervision and control of this foreman. The superintendent of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, Reuss, testified that it was Smith's duty to do what his foreman, the Pacific Gas & Electric Company's foreman, told him to do. One Evans, foreman of said crew of linemen during the course of dismantling the derrick testified that Smith was directly under his charge the morning of the injury and prior to that time, and that he would not have permitted any one other than his superiors in the Pacific Gas & Electric Company to interfere with or to direct Smith, the deceased. One Harris, foreman for the Pacific Gas & Electric Company and at intervals in charge of the said linemen's crew while the derrick was being erected, testified that McPeake, superintendent of the Stacey Company, "* * * told us how he wanted it done. He told us the results he wanted but he didn't tell us how to get those results. * * * Several times he came to me and said: 'Be careful not to drop anything on that floor.' That is the thing he impressed upon me. * * * He told us he didn't want anything dropped. It was up to me to see that nothing was dropped."

Further testimony was given by Harris showing that he was acting under the direction and control of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and that at no time did he recognize the Stacey Company as having the power or the right to direct him as to the method and the details of the work. When a doubt came to his mind concerning the strength of the cable to be used he did not consult with McPeake. In this behalf Harris testified as follows:

"At the time we had some little discussion about the weight this mast was supposed to carry, and I went to Mr. Reuss (superintendent of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company). I told him I didn't know about this, but I did not feel that I wanted to be responsible if anything should break. He said, 'You better put in heavy enough the stuff we furnish, so if anything breaks, it will be Mr. McPeake's stuff that will break.' I discussed with Mr. McPeake how much strain was going to be on it, so I used my own judgment, and put in our stuff three times as strong as any strain that would come on it."

is apparent, from the evidence adduced upon the hearing before the Commission, that the foremen in charge of the linemen's crew understood that they were at all times under the supervision and control of Reuss, superintendent of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, and not McPeake. It is true that McPeake, superintendent of Stacey Company, stopped the progress of the work of dismantling the derrick for a few moments merely for the purpose of determining where the poles of the derrick should be placed when it was dismantled, but this fact will not suffice to warrant the inference that he assumed the direction and control of the actual work of dismantling the derrick, or that he assumed to direct and control the operations of the linemen's crew engaged in doing that work. Nor is the fact that certain general directions may have been given by the person desiring the work to be done, concerning the location and the character of the work, sufficient in and of itself to show the right or an assumption of the right to control and direct the work and the workmen employed thereon, and consequently it cannot be held that such fact, standing alone, will suffice to establish the relation of special employer and special employee. The fact remains that neither the individual members of the linemen's crew nor their foremen surrendered their "own judgment" to the direction and control of the Stacey Company's superintendent.

[5] This review of the evidence adduced upon the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission, as disclosed by the record before us, compels the conclusion, we think, that there was no evidence to support the finding of the Commission of the existence of a special employment between the Stacey Company and Smith, the deceased. The facts thus disclosed bring this case, it seems to us, well within the rule enunciated in the case of Western Indemnity Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721, where this court said:

"The test of 'control,' however, means 'complete control.' * * * 'It is well settled that, where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring the responsibilities, or acquiring the immunities, of a master, with respect to the person controlled.' * * * but in weighing the control exercised we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger undertaking."

The complete and exclusive control and supervision over the linemen's crew having been here exercised by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, it must be held solely responsible for the death of Smith, the deceased.

Respondents contend that the previous decisions of this court sustaining an award against both general and special employer were based "upon circumstances almost identical" with those of the instant case. We are unable to appreciate the force of this contention. Those cases relied upon in this behalf are not in point, and may be readily differentiated from the situation presented by the facts set forth in the record before us. The substantial distinction is that in the instant case there was no assumption of direct control and supervision, while in the cases cited by respondents there was such a direct, affirmative assumption of control and supervision over the workmen of the general employer so as to make them the special employees of the party exercising the control. In the case of Employers' L. A. Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra, the facts were these: The Riverside Portland Cement Company, engaged in the manufacture of cement, contemplated the installation of certain machinery. The plans and specifications for such work were made by the engineers of the cement company. The Wellman-Lewis Company was engaged in the business of installing and handling of large machinery, and had in its employ experienced and skilled men who could do this work. An arrangement was made between the cement company and the Wellman-Lewis Company whereby the latter furnished to the former its employees, under a foreman, also in its employ, to do the required work. The cement company furnished all the materials and had the direction and control of the employees furnished, including the foreman; it kept account of the time of all such employees, who were obliged to use the time clock of said company; it had the right to require the furnishing of such additional employees as it should deem necessary and to cause the discharge of any employees whom it might regard as undesirable. This court affirmed the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission holding both parties as special and general employer, respectively, liable for the reason that the finding of the Commission was based upon the joint control by the general and special employer upon evidence which clearly showed the existence of such joint control. The evidence in the case at bar, as we have previously indicated, shows no such direction and control. In Pruitt v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra, it appears that one Conklin died as the result of injuries he received when the truck he was driving was struck by a train. Several trucks with drivers, among whom was Conklin, were hired by Pruitt to the firm of Graham Bros. The drivers were under the entire control and direction of Graham Bros., who gave orders as to how and where the materials were to be hauled and the trucks otherwise used. Furthermore, there was a special agreement between Pruitt and Conklin by which the latter was to retain 25 per cent. of the wages paid to him by Graham Bros., and he was to be charged for the upkeep of the truck, which he kept at his own home; while Pruitt was to pay for repairs and for the oil and gasoline used in its operation. In affirming the award made by the Commission against Graham Bros. and annulling the award made against Pruitt, the court said:

"There is neither evidence nor finding to show that petitioner ever exerted, or had the right to exert, the slightest degree of control over Conklin in connection with his employment in the service of Graham Bros. Yet to uphold an award against him it must so appear."

In Insurance Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra, the American Stevedoring Company, organized by certain lumber dealers to furnish lumber handlers, under an arrangement with the lumber companies, sent crews of lumber handlers to a company, as requested, to perform the required work. The men were hired by, paid by, and discharged by the stevedoring company, but were under the full control and direction, as to the method of doing the work, of the company for whom they happened to be working. The lumber companies some time subsequent, when the purpose of the establishment of the stevedoring company had been practically accomplished, hired the men and placed them on the pay roll of the stevedoring company. The decedent was hired by the stevedoring company, and was sent to the Pope & Talbot Company yards, where, while acting under the complete control and direction of this lumber company, he was injured. The finding of the Commission holding both special employer and general employer liable was affirmed. The court said:

"Nor can it be questioned that he was a special employee of Pope & Talbot. The evidence shows he worked in its yard exclusively, subject to its entire direction and control in the performance of his duties."

The control and direction exercised by the special employer in that case clearly differentiates it from the instant case. In Famous Players Lasky Corp. v. Industrial Acc. Com., supra, two pilots were furnished by the Williams Aircraft Corporation to the Lasky company to be used in producing a motion picture. The only directions given to the pilots were that they were to fly to a certain place and there report to the Lasky corporation for instructions. The pilots, upon arriving on the lot where the picture was to be filmed, were directed by the representatives of the Lasky corporation to look through the camera to get its range of vision and to direct their flight so as to come within the picture. A flight was made, but being too high the pilots were directed to fly closer to the ground. After some demurring between themselves, the pilots complied with this direction, and in the course of the flight the accident occurred in which one of the pilots was injured. Although two representatives of the Williams Aircraft Corporation were present during all the time when the directions were given to the pilots by the representatives of the Lasky corporation, they interposed no objection and exercised neither control nor direction over either of the pilots. All of the instructions to the pilots as to the time, place, and method of their flight were given to them by the Lasky corporation representatives. The direction and control exercised by the Lasky corporation was never present in the instant case. The two Industrial Accident Commission decisions, in which petitions for a writ of review were denied, cited by respondents in support of their contention are, also, beside the point presented by the instant case and are clearly distinguishable. In both cases, Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., L. A. No. 2754, and Gordon and Harrison v. Industrial Acc. Com., L. A. No. 8323, there was such an exercise of direction and control as to establish the special employment found by the Commission.

The conclusion we have reached upon the principal point in the case renders unnecessary a discussion of whether or not the award should be made against the insurance carrier to whom the premium for the insurance of the deceased has been paid.

The award against the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company is annulled, and the award against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company is affirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CALIFORNIA, DIVISION OF WATER RIGHTS et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SISKIYOU COUNTY et al. (Sac. 3670.)

1. Certiorari ⊜35—Jurisdiction of superior court of petition for writ of review conferred by Constitution, and is to be exercised as provided by Code of Civil Procedure.

Jurisdiction of superior court of petition for writ of review, commonly known as certiorari (Const. art. 6, § 5; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1067–1077), of act of state water commission in issuing under Water Commission Act, § 12, certificate dividing water rights, is conferred by Constitution, and is to be exercised as provided in Code of Civil Procedure.

2. Certiorari ⊜1—When issuance of warrant for writ of review, commonly known as certiorari, warranted, stated.

To warrant issuance of a writ of review, inferior tribunal, board, or officer must exercise a judicial function in matter sought to be reviewed, and must have exceeded its jurisdiction therein, and there must be no appeal from action complained of, nor any plain, speedy and adequate remedy, and application must be made on verified petition of a party beneficially interested, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1068, 1069.

3. Certiorari ⟸24—Superior court held without jurisdiction of petition for writ of review of action of state water commission in issuing certificate dividing water rights.

Superior court held without jurisdiction of petition for writ of review of action of state water commission in issuing certificate for division of water rights under Water Commission Act, § 12; function exercised therein being administrative, or ministerial and not judicial, in view of Const. art. 6, § 1, not authorizing Legislature to vest judicial power in commission and Water Commission Act, §§ 12, 15, 18, 19, and section 1b (as added by St. 1923, p. 162, § 2), and sections 36b, 36f (as added by St. 1917, pp. 236, 238, §§ 15, 19), indicating that no right of review exists in the courts.

4. Constitutional law ⟸56—Waters and water courses, ⟸128—Water Commission Act held not violative of organic law.

Water Commission Act, § 12, defining authority of state water commission, manifests an intention not to confer any judicial power on commission, and hence is not violative of the organic law.

5. Prohibition ⟸3(5)—Writ held to lie to restrain superior court from taking jurisdiction of petition for review of action of state water commission in issuing certificate dividing water rights.

Prohibition held to lie to restrain superior court from taking jurisdiction of petition for review of action of state water commission in issuing certificate dividing water rights, where superior court could make no valid disposition of petition except to dismiss it, and petitioners' remedy by appeal not being plain, speedy, and adequate.

In Bank.

Application for writ of prohibition by the Department of Public Works of the State of California, Division of Water Rights and others, directed against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Siskiyou, and Hon. Walter E. Herzinger, as Judge presiding therein. Writ granted.

Spencer Burroughs, of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Robert D. Duke, of San Francisco, and C. F. Holland, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondents from proceeding with the hearing and determination of a petition for a writ of review pending in the respondent court.

It is alleged in the petition that Frank and Carl Langford, on the 12th day of September, 1908, duly posted a notice of appropriation of the running water of the Klamath river to the extent of 500,000 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure (10,000 second feet), and on the 18th day of the same month recorded a copy of the notice in the office of the recorder of Siskiyou county; that said appropriation was maintained according to law, and was, on July 21, 1922, transferred to Electro Metals Company, a trust organization, which is the present owner and holder thereof; that on November 17, 1922, the said Electro Metals Company filed an application under section 12 of the Water Commission Act (Stats. 1913, p. 1012) in the office of the division of water rights in the department of Public Works for a certificate prescribing the time within which the full amount of its acquired water appropriation should be applied to a useful and beneficial purpose; that, after due investigation, the division of water rights found that said applicant and its predecessors in interest had proceeded with due diligence in proportion to the magnitude of the project, to carry on the work necessary to put 3,000 cubic feet per second of the water of the Klamath river to beneficial use under said notice of appropriation, and for good cause shown, and as provided by law, duly issued, under date of July 19, 1923, a certificate to said Electro Metals Company prescribing the time for the complete application of the 3,000 cubic feet of water per second theretofore appropriated to beneficial use for hydroelectric power purposes; that on the 18th day of August, 1923, a petition for a writ of review was filed in the respondent court, entitled "The Klamath River Packers' Association, a corporation, Plaintiff v. The Department of Public Works, Division of Water Rights, Defendant," and wherein the action of the defendant therein named in issuing the said certificate was sought to be reviewed; that the respondent court issued the writ of review, fixing a time and place for the return thereof; that a copy of the writ was served on petitioners, at whose instance a motion to quash the writ, duly noticed, was, on November 6, 1923, heard by the respondent court and denied. Following the denial of the motion to quash, the petition herein was filed. An alternative writ was issued. On behalf of the respondent a general demurrer to the petition and an answer were filed at the same time.

The sole question for determination is whether the respondent court has jurisdiction to entertain and determine a petition for a writ of review affecting the action of the division of water rights in issuing a certificate under section 12 of the Water Commission Act. That section, so far as pertinent here, provides:

"The state water commission shall have authority to, and may, for good cause shown, upon the application of any appropriator or user of water under an appropriation made and maintained according to law prior to the passage of this act, prescribe the time within which the full amount of the water appropriated shall be applied to a useful or beneficial purpose; provided, that said appropriator or user shall have proceeded, with due diligence in proportion to the magnitude of the project, to carry on the work necessary to put the water to a beneficial use; and in determining said time said commission shall grant a reasonable time after the construction of the works or canal or ditch or conduit or storage system used for the diversion, conveyance or storage of water; and in doing so said commission shall also take into consideration the cost of the application of such water to the useful or beneficial purpose, the good faith of the appropriator, the market for water or power to be supplied, the present demand therefor, and the income or use that may be required to provide fair and reasonable returns upon the investment and any other facts or matters pertinent to the inquiry. Upon prescribing such time the state water commission shall issue a certificate showing its determination of the matter. For good cause shown, the state water commission may extend the time by granting further certificates. And, for the time so prescribed or extended, the said appropriator or user shall be deemed to be putting said water to a beneficial use. * * *"

Following its consideration of the matters involved in said section 12, and pursuant to said application, the division of water rights, which is the successor of the state water commission, issued the following certificate:

"This is to certify that the division of water rights has considered the work done by the Electro Metals Company of San Francisco, California, in appropriating three thousand (3,000) cubic feet per second of the waters of the Klamath river for hydroelectric purposes under a notice of appropriation dated September 12, 1908, and recorded in book 6 of Water Rights at page 340 of the Records of the county recorder of Siskiyou County, California, and as the division of water rights has determined that such works have been prosecuted with due diligence it hereby fixes the time within which the full amount of water appropriated shall be applied to a useful or beneficial purpose as ending August 1st, 1929."

[1, 2] It is contended by the petitioners herein that the respondent court has no jurisdiction to entertain and determine the writ of review, for the reason that section 12 contains no provision for such a review by the court. It is pointed out that numerous other sections of the act provide specifically for a review by or relief in the courts after action taken by the division of water rights, and it is urged that because the Legislature has omitted to provide for a review of the action under section 12 the rule of expressio unius est exclusio alterius should be applied, and the respondent court be denied jurisdiction in the matter pending before it. It is the position of the respondents that, in entertaining an application pursuant to section 12 and issuing a certificate thereunder, the petitioners were exercising a judicial function, and that therefore the respondent court has jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding for a writ of review here brought in question. In order clearly to understand these contentions, it is necessary to define the nature of the review proceedings which each party has in mind. It is undeniable that the writ of review pending in the respondent court and to prohibit the determination of which the present proceeding was brought is a proceeding such as is authorized by the Constitution and statutes and commonly known as certiorari. Const. art. 6, § 5; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1067–1077. On the other hand, the writ of review in the respondent court, which the petitioners claim the Legislature has impliedly denied or not provided for in section 12, is a statutory review under the Water Commission Act. As to the former, the jurisdiction of the superior court is conferred by the Constitution and is to be exercised as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure. The constitutional provision, together with the sections of the Code referred to, are but an affirmance of the common-law jurisdiction of the court in certiorari. 4 Cal. Jur. 1020. Certain essentials to the proper exercise of the power to issue and determine such a writ must concur. Quinchard v. Board of Trustees, 113 Cal. 664, 45 P. 856. Under section 1068, Code of Civil Procedure, the inferior tribunal, board, or officer must exercise a judicial function in the matter sought to be reviewed, and must have exceeded its or his jurisdiction in such matter. Also, there must be no appeal from the action complained of, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy. By section 1069, the application must be made on the verified petition of a party beneficially interested.

[3] It is apparent that at least one of those essentials is and was not present when the respondent court issued the writ of review, namely, the exercise by the petitioners of a judicial function. This is true, for the reason that it was not within the power of the Legislature to vest judicial power in the petitioners. Their authority under the Water Commission Act is statewide. Under section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution:

"The Legislature would be without authority to give judicial power to any general state board or tribunal. Except for local purposes the section disposes of the whole judicial power of the state and vests all of it in the courts expressly named therein, leaving none at the disposal of the Legislature." Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 P. 24; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390.

See, also, concurring opinion of Mr. Chief Justice Shaw in Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Comm., 187 Cal. 533, 202 P. 874.

And in no other section of the Constitution do we find authority in the Legislature to vest judicial power in the petitioners under the Water Commission Act. The cases of Imperial Water Co. v. Board of Supervisors, 162 Cal. 14, 120 P. 780, and other cases of like import and relied on by the respondents are not in point, because they involved the scope or validity of judicial powers exercised by local tribunals, boards, or officers whose jurisdiction was limited to incorporated cities, towns, townships, counties, or cities and counties, and did not involve the authority of any tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial powers and having statewide jurisdiction.

The respondents insist that the petitioners act judicially when they determine under section 12 that "due diligence" and "good faith" have been exercised by an appropriator, and that there has been "good cause shown" for the issuance of the certificate. In a certain sense the determination of those matters involves the weighing of facts and arriving at conclusions from those facts, and, while such matters are common in a judicial proceeding, we think their determination under that section is of an administrative or ministerial character only. The section provides for no notice to parties interested, contains no provision for a hearing or for procedure looking to the adjudication of the rights of any one. The conclusions which the petitioners arrive at under whatever investigation they may see fit to make pursuant to the application are merely for their own guidance in the administration of their duties under the section. Their conclusions and determinations in that respect are ineffectual for any other purpose, and their action under the section does not constitute a hearing and a determination of a controversy in a judicial sense. French v. Cook, 173 Cal. 126, 160 P. 411. To hold that section 12 confers any judicial power on the petitioners would, of course, be tantamount to holding said section unconstitutional to that extent. We think it was not intended by the legislative branch in the enactment of that section to confer any judicial power on the petitioners, and therefore conclude that the section is not violative of the organic law. As the petitioners do not, and could not under the Constitution as now framed, exercise judicial functions, it follows that the proceeding for the writ of review pending in the respondent court lacks one of the elements essential to its proper determination.

The review, which the petitioners contend the legislative branch has impliedly denied to the respondent court, is such a review as is provided for in other sections of the Water Commission Act. Such, for instance, as is provided in section 1b, wherein any person interested in an application for a permit to appropriate water or any party protestant may obtain a review of the action of the commission in issuing or refusing to issue a permit for such appropriation. This section was added in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 162, § 2), after the decision by this court in the case of Tulare Water Co. v. State Water Commission, supra, wherein it was held that the consideration of an application for an appropriation of water under section 15 of the act did not call for the exercise of a judicial function, and that mandamus would lie to compel the issuance of the permit. Again, in section 18, a court review is provided for in connection with an order revoking the approval of an application for a permit to use unappropriated water or water which, having been appropriated, has found its way back into the stream, lake, or other body of water; also, a court review is provided for in section 19, where the commission has determined that work performed by the holder of a permit has not been completed in conformity with law; and still again section 36b (St. 1917, p. 236) provides for a court review of a determination by the commission of the rights of various claimants of the waters of a stream based upon prior appropriations. Section 36f (St. 1917, p. 238) provides that the commission shall have authority, after notice and a hearing, to fix a time limit for the completion of an appropriation of water, where such rights of appropriation were initiated prior to the adoption of the Water Commission Act. A review of a determination under section 36f is provided for, but such review is confined to the procedure outlined in section 36b of the act. The powers of the commission, under sections 12 and 36f, are similar in this, that both sections authorize the commission to fix a time limit for the completion of appropriations of water made prior to the adoption of the act, but admittedly the application involved in the proceeding pending in the respondent court was made under section 12. No court review is there provided for, and no proceedings for such a review elsewhere found in the act can be made applicable thereto. It may here be said that, if and when a judicial review is provided for in the act itself, it has been held, under similar constitutional and statutory provisions, that the action of the state officers made reviewable is not determinative of property rights. Their function is similar to that of a referee whose determination is not binding except upon approval of the court. Stuart v. Norviel (Ariz.) 226 P. 908. Reference to other sections of the Water Commission Act and to the right of review thereunder has been made merely for the purpose of indicating that under section 12 there is no right of review in the courts and the omission to provide for such review must be deemed to have been intended.

[4, 5] It must therefore be concluded that no right to a review of the action of the petitioners under a section 12 application is provided for in the Water Commission Act. It must also be concluded that the proceeding in certiorari pending in the respondent court is and will be ineffectual as a basis either for affirming or modifying or annulling the action of the petitioners in the premises. While it is true that the respondent court, in exercising its constitutional jurisdiction in certiorari, would have the power to decide in the first instance whether or not any one of the elements essential to the proper determination of the proceeding were present, we think that when it appears as a matter of law on the face of the record before us, and it does so appear, that the respondent court could make no valid disposition of the proceeding before it except to dismiss the same, we are disposed to issue the writ to the end that the petitioners be not put to the expense and annoyance of perfecting a voluminous return and attending what would undoubtedly be a protracted hearing in Siskiyou county, a county far removed from their headquarters. Under such circumstances we are satisfied that the remedy by appeal would not be plain, speedy, and adequate. Davis v. Superior Court, 184 Cal. 691, 195 P. 390; Consolidated, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 92, 207 P. 552; A. G. Col Co. v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 238 P. 926.

The demurrer to the petition is overruled. The answer raises no issues of fact which, if resolved in respondents' favor, would justify a denial of the writ. Let the peremptory writ of prohibition issue.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS of the State of California, DIVISION OF WATER RIGHTS, and W. F. McClure, as Director of Public Works, and H. A. Kluegel, as Chief of the Division of Water Rights, Petitioners, v. SUPERIOR COURT of the State of California, IN AND FOR THE COUNTY OF SISKIYOU, and Hon. Walter E. Herzinger, as Judge Presiding Therein, Respondents. (Sac. 3671.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1925.)

In Bank. Application for writ of prohibition prayed to be directed to the Superior Court of Siskiyou County, Walter E. Herzinger, Judge, to restrain action in a proceeding of certiorari to review an order affecting water rights. Writ granted.

Spencer Burroughs, of Sacramento, for petitioners.

Robert D. Duke, of San Francisco, and C. F. Holland, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondents from taking any further action in a proceeding for a writ of review pending in the respondent court. The questions involved herein are the same as those considered and disposed of in the case of Department of Public Works et al. v. Superior Court (Sac. No. 3670) 239 P. 1076, this day decided, except that in this proceeding the state board of fish and game commissioners is the applicant for a writ of review in the superior court. Because of our determination that the petitioners herein do not exercise a judicial function in acting on an application under section 12 of the Water Commission Act (St. 1913, p. 1018), it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the state board of fish and game commissioners is a party beneficially interested in the certiorari proceedings in the superior court.

On the authority of the case above referred to and this day decided the demurrer is overruled. Let the peremptory writ of prohibition issue.

PEOPLE v. GARBUTT. (Cr. 2753.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1925. Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1925.)

1. Criminal law ⊂665(1)—Motion to exclude witnesses not testifying at time addressed to sound discretion of court, and exclusion of principal witnesses only was not an abuse of discretion.

In a prosecution for murder, a motion to exclude witnesses not testifying at time, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2043, is addressed to sound discretion of court, and where court excluded each of the two principal witnesses while the other was testifying, and there were no accommodations elsewhere for other witnesses, there was no abuse of discretion.

2. Criminal law ⊂1153(4)—Witnesses ⊂240(2)—Allowing leading questions within discretion of court, and discretion deemed abused only in exceptional case.

In a prosecution for murder, the matter of allowing leading questions is within discretion of court, and it is only in exceptional cases that trial court will be held to have abused its discretion.

3. Criminal law ⊂706, 730(3)—Question assuming fact of murder not reversible error, where used in connection with time of act only, and duly admonished by court.

In a prosecution for murder, question put to a witness, "Was that after murder?" is prejudicial as impressing jury with fact of murder prior to such a conviction, but where used by prosecutor in relation to time only, and court gave an admonitory instruction promptly, it is not reversible error.

4. Criminal law ⊂730(3)—Statement of prosecutor as to correctness of grand jury transcript and refusal to have it read held not error under the circumstances.

In a prosecution for murder, statement by prosecutor as to correctness of statements of witness made before grand jury, and refusal to have witness read grand jury transcript before it was shown to be correct, was not prejudicial error, where court instructed jury not to regard prosecutor's statement as evidence and witness was fully questioned as to such testimony.

5. Homicide ⟸287—Evidence held sufficient to warrant instruction as to robbery as motive for homicide.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to warrant inference that motive of homicide was robbery, and to support an instruction by the court as to robbery.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Harry Garbutt was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Kenneth K. Scott and Moses C. Davis, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, of Los Angeles, for the People.

LAWLOR, Acting C. J. An indictment returned by the grand jury of the county of Los Angeles and filed September 25, 1924, charged the defendant with the murder of Mrs. Dorothy Lee Hunn in the city of Pasadena. He was tried upon the charge and found guilty of murder in the first degree, the verdict calling for the death penalty. Subsequently a motion for a new trial was interposed on behalf of defendant and denied. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his said motion for a new trial.

We will first outline a portion of the evidence leading up to and connected with the homicide. The appellant came to California from an eastern state in December, 1923. Upon his arrival he took up his abode with his aunt in Los Angeles—a Mrs. Fannie Moorhouse—and remained there for some time. During his residence in Los Angeles he was known under the alias name of Harry Connors, it appearing that he had recently been released from Joliet penitentiary after serving a term for burglary. Shortly after Christmas, 1923, appellant met the deceased at his aunt's residence. According to the evidence he had called at the deceased's residence several times before his final visit on September 19, 1924, when she met her death. She was a married woman, who had reached middle age, and resided at 90 North Madison avenue, Pasadena, with an adopted daughter, Virginia Lee Hunn, who was 10 years of age. The husband of the deceased resided in Chicago. She had some means and owned considerable jewelry, which she frequently, if not habitually, carried upon her person.

It was about 4:30 o'clock in the afternoon of September 19, 1924, when appellant called at the residence of the deceased. He was admitted by one Frederick R. Gibson, who was known as a cousin of the deceased, and who seems to have spent considerable time in her company. As the dinner hour approached appellant was invited by the hostess to remain to dine. He accepted the invitation. In the meantime the child, Virginia, came into the house. The party, consisting of the deceased, the child, Frederick R. Gibson and the appellant, sat down to dinner shortly after 6 o'clock. At the completion of the meal the child was taken by the deceased to her room and put to bed. This was about 7 o'clock. From this point there is a divergence in the testimony as to the succeeding events. Gibson relates that he retired to the bathroom, leaving appellant and the deceased, who had returned after putting the child in bed, in the kitchen alone; that he was in the bathroom a very brief period when he heard a scuffle or commotion in the kitchen; that he left the bathroom and was unable to gain entrance to the kitchen, as the door leading thereto was either locked or held by some one on the opposite side; that he then went to a neighbor's house to secure aid, and while returning to the residence he noticed appellant going down the other side of the street; that he (Gibson) and the neighbor, whose assistance he had enlisted, found the body of the deceased lying in a small runway or court to the rear of the residence; that they carried the body into the house; that they observed wounds on her head and a bullet wound in her chest, from all of which the blood was issuing profusely, and that medical and police aid was summoned and the deceased pronounced dead. This version of Frederick R. Gibson is corroborated in certain particulars by the child who, as she testified, had witnessed some of the actions of appellant and Gibson from her room where she was lying in bed. The similarity in the testimony of Gibson and the child will later appear.

Appellant, on the other hand, after his arrest, gave a version at variance in important particulars with that given by Gibson as well as the child. He stated, in substance, that when the deceased went with the child to the latter's room he arose, retired from the kitchen, and went to the bathroom just as the deceased returned to the kitchen; that Gibson and the deceased were alone there; that while in the bathroom he heard a scuffling in the kitchen; that he returned thereto, and as he entered found Gibson striking the deceased on the head and face with an instrument of some sort; that he intervened to stop the attack upon the deceased; that Gibson thereupon raised the hand with which he was holding the weapon of attack; that he (appellant) warded off the blow with one hand, reached into his inside coat pocket, pulled out a gun and pressed it against Gibson; that the latter shoved or struck the hand holding the gun, causing it to discharge; that Gibson then fled from the house and he (appellant), not knowing that the bullet had struck the deceased, followed in pursuit of Gibson, but that when he reached the street Gibson was not in sight; that he then realized he was in a bad predicament because he was an "ex-con"; that he therefore walked down the other side of the street and away from the scene; that after he had gone some distance he telephoned for a taxicab and drove to the Rosslyn Hotel in Los Angeles, which he entered by the main entrance and left by a side exit without paying his cab fare; that he then repaired to the Hayward Hotel where he was living with one Irene Kirkoff; that he changed his clothes, whereupon he and the woman left, and that they stayed at the Earl Hotel that night. His subsequent movements are sufficiently set forth in the summary of the testimony later appearing.

I. It is claimed by appellant that the shooting of the deceased was accidental, and for which he was in no way legally responsible. But it is not contended that the evidence was insufficient as matter of law to support the verdict of a felonious killing; indeed it is conceded that "the statement set forth by the Attorney General is very fair and to the point, * * *" wherein, among other things, the Attorney General asserted that "the appellant on this appeal has not questioned the sufficiency of the evidence. * * *"

[1] II. It is contended by the appellant that:

"The court committed error prejudicial to the substantial rights of * * * the appellant herein, to a fair and impartial trial guaranteed him under the Constitution and laws of the state, * * * especially in refusing to grant the motion of the defendant at the beginning of the trial to exclude all witnesses in the case from the courtroom, so as to prevent the persons so excluded from hearing the testimony of witnesses under examination, and in enforcing the exclusion only as to one witness, viz., Virginia Lee Hunn, during the examination of Frederick R. Gibson. * * * Applying the doctrine as laid down by Mr. Wigmore, this honorable court will see, by reading the evidence given by Clifford R. Hunn, Frederick R. Gibson, Franklin W. Latham, Mrs. F. W. Latham, Miss Marceline Keiser, Mrs. Georgia Keiser, Virginia Lee Hunn, Irene Kirkoff, Robert E. O'Rourke, and Mrs. Lucretia Kemper, that all of these witnesses testified more or less to the occurrences immediately before and after the death of Dorothy Lee Hunn. And counsel state that effective cross-examination of Mr. and Mrs. Latham, Miss and Mrs. Keiser, and Mrs. Lucretia Kemper was prevented by their being present and hearing the testimony of the witnesses Frederick R. Gibson and Virginia Lee Hunn. Miss Keiser and Mrs. Keiser testified as to Mr. Gibson's actions following the noises which they claimed to have heard in the Hunn house. Mr. and Mrs. Latham testified as to Mr. Gibson's actions immediately after he left the Hunn house and after he got in touch with the Lathams. * * *

"All of these facts were known to the district attorney before the trial came up, but they were not, and could not, be known to the defendant, as many of these witnesses did not testify before the grand jury; so that the apparent frankness of the district attorney was very misleading and most prejudicial to the defendant. * * *"

The following statement of the Attorney General is supported by the record:

"An examination of the record will show that the most vital testimony introduced by the prosecution was that of Virginia Lee Hunn and F. R. Gibson, the two persons present in the house at the time of the homicide. As to these two witnesses the court did exercise its discretion in excluding one from the courtroom while the other was testifying."

Appellant moved for the exclusion of the witnesses before any of them were examined. We quote from the record:

"Mr. Scott: At this time, if the court please, we desire to invoke the rule for the exclusion of witnesses.

"Mr. Dennison: Well, I don't know of any rule; it is a discretionary matter addressed to the court, and, of course, it is proper to do it when it is convenient for the witnesses. In our courtroom the only convenience we have for witnesses is out of the courtroom. In preliminary hearings that is arbitrary, but the rest is directed to the sound discretion of the court and exercised wherever there is provision made for witnesses. We haven't any special room for them.

"Mr. Davis: Due to the importance of this case, we want a fair and impartial trial; we move the rule be invoked and the witnesses be excluded from the courtroom during the testimony of the witness on the stand.

"The Court: Well; I would be willing to do that for those witnesses whom you claim will testify to the same transaction, but not as to the others.

"Mr. Scott: As we understand it, we think we would be entitled to it for all the witnesses; that the court would exclude all witnesses, under the rule.

"The Court: I don't understand that you have a right to exclude the witnesses as an arbitrary matter.

"Mr. Scott: It is a matter of the sound discretion of the court.

"The Court: As I say, I would be glad to exclude those witnesses, where there are two or more who testify regarding the same transaction, the same conversation."

Section 2043, Code of Civil Procedure, provides in part:

"If either party requires it, the judge may exclude from the courtroom any witness of the adverse party not at the time under examination, so that he may not hear the testimony of other witnesses. * * *"

It was held in People v. Ong Git, 23 Cal. App. 148, 152, 137 P. 283, 285, cited by the respondent, involving a charge of murder:

"The exclusion of a witness, however, is not a matter of absolute right in every case. A request for such exclusion is addressed to the discretion of the trial judge, the exercise of which must be controlled largely by the circumstances of the individual case. People v. Garnett, 29 Cal. 622; People v. Sam Lung, 70 Cal. 515 [11 P. 673]."

For a further statement of the rule see People v. McCarty, 117 Cal. 65, 48 P. 984; People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 441, 76 P. 45; People v. Gasser, 34 Cal. App. 541, 168 P. 157. That this is a matter within the discretion of the trial court is thus conceded by the appellant:

"And we agree with the conclusion that the exclusion of witnesses is within the sound discretion of the court."

It cannot be held, in view of the fact that the court excluded the child and Frederick R. Gibson, the two principal witnesses, when the other was testifying, considered in connection with the absence of accommodations elsewhere for the witnesses, that the court did not exercise a sound discretion in the premises.

[2] Nor do we perceive any ground for the asserted misconduct on the part of the district attorney in connection with this motion. The appellant next contends that:

"As a further evidence that the district attorney misconducted himself so as to prevent a fair trial of the case, the court erred in allowing the district attorney to lead witnesses, notwithstanding the repeated objections of defendant's counsel."

Many excerpts from the transcript are included in the brief to illustrate the occasions upon which it is claimed that the district attorney, over appellant's objections, misconducted himself by leading the witnesses. In answer to appellant's contention, the Attorney General argues that "it is a well recognized rule that leading questions are within the discretion of the trial court"—citing section 2046, Code of Civil Procedure; People v. Nunley, 142 Cal. 441, 445, 76 P. 45; People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 591, 593, 62 P. 1072; People v. Bannon, 59 Cal. App. 50, 59, 209 P. 1029; and People v. Hinrich, 53 Cal. App. 186, 199 P. 1058, adding:

"Though we have briefly answered counsel under this assignment of error we are mindful that the requisite affirmative showing of such an error does not appear."

It is declared in People v. Nunley, supra:

"Two questions asked by the prosecution were objected to as leading. If it be conceded that they were leading, the answer is, that this is a matter within the discretion of the trial court, and no abuse of that discretion is apparent."

And what is said in the following excerpt from People v. Brown, supra, may be regarded as an answer to the contention here:

"At the same time, it is only in very exceptional cases that we will declare the trial court to have abused its discretion in allowing an attorney to ask leading questions. The motives for the action of the trial court in matters of this kind are often of the character that the printed record brought before us but poorly discloses, and for this reason alone a wide range is given it in governing the conduct of attorneys in the examination of witnesses."

[3] As an additional assignment of misconduct upon the part of the district attorney exception is taken to this question put to a witness: "Q. Was that after the murder?" It is contended by appellant that:

"If the defendant had no further objections to urge, counsel feel that the above statements alone would be sufficient ground for reversal of the case, as it shows such malicious misconduct on the part of the district attorney, and we feel sure that the ruling of the court on page 61, line 4: 'The Court: The jury will understand that question relates to time and is not an effort to introduce evidence which will prove, which will determine whether or not murder was committed, that particular question'—was not sufficient to cure the prejudice thus put into the minds of the jury. The impression of 'murder' placed in the minds of the jury by the statements and the conduct of the district attorney, and especially by the manner in which he brought out the word 'murder,' was very prejudicial to the defendant, for up to this time there had been no conviction of murder; and such an impression should not have been made upon the minds of the jury."

In reply the Attorney General cites People v. Daily, 135 Cal. 104, 106, 67 P. 16, and claims that "a reading of the two preceding questions shows that the district attorney was attempting to elicit from the witness the time when he first saw the hammer with relation to the homicide. It is to be further noted that upon objection to such use of the word the court instructed the jury"—then follows the instruction above quoted. It is true, of course, that the killing should not have been characterized as "murder" in advance of a verdict so finding. But we do not think, in view of the connection in which the word was used by the district attorney, and the admonitory instruction promptly given by the court, that the jury was influenced thereby.

[4] Again it is insisted by the appellant that:

"The district attorney further misconducted himself in testifying as to the correctness or incorrectness of the statements made by the witness Virginia Lee Hunn as transcribed by the grand jury reporter and set forth in the reporter's transcript of the proceedings before the grand jury."

Under this contention there is set forth a statement by the district attorney objecting to the action of appellant's counsel in seeking to have the child read her grand jury testimony before testifying to it upon the ground that the transcript thereof contained "considerable clerical errors." In other words, that counsel for appellant should show the transcript to be correct before eliciting the testimony.

The incident is assigned as prejudicial error. If the district attorney intended to clear the transcript of the asserted errors, a better course perhaps was either to have called attention to the discrepancies as they were reached in the presentation of the testimony or developed them on cross-examination. The point to the contention is that so characterizing the transcript was calculated to weaken in the minds of the jury the testimony sought to be elicited. But, here, too, the court admonished the jury, evidently to avoid any possible prejudice, as follows:

"I am sure the jurors all understood that what Mr. Dennison said was not evidence and not offered as evidence, but merely as an explanation of his part in replying to the remarks made by Mr. Davis, after you had heard what Mr. Dennison had to say, or words to that effect. The jury understands that it is not evidence. You are now instructed it is not evidence, what Mr. Dennison said, but was merely a statement, of course. The motion is overruled."

Moreover, as was said in People v. Putman, 129 Cal. 258, 262, 61 P. 961, 962:

"Counsel's conduct must reach a course of proceedings militating against justice and the fair and orderly conduct which should characterize a judicial proceeding in criminal cases before error can be predicated on it. People v. Ward, 105 Cal. 340, 38 P. 945; People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 630, 49 P. 833."

See, also People v. Smith, 143 Cal. 597, 77 P. 449. And it is to be kept in view that the child was fully interrogated as to such testimony, and it does not appear that any injury resulted. Nor do we think any harm was done by repeating in rebuttal a question put to the child and answered on her examination in chief, notwithstanding it was clearly not proper rebuttal.

III. It is next contended that:

"The court erred in overruling certain objections of the defendant, made at the time of the trial, to the admission of evidence taken and received at the trial."

Several pages of the transcript are then quoted, which it is unnecessary to set forth here. We have examined the rulings complained of, and do not find any prejudicial error in any of them.

IV. Hereunder it is urged that:

"The court erred in sustaining objections of the district attorney to evidence brought out by the defendant on cross-examination, and refusing to admit such evidence and testimony."

It is apparent from the record that many of the questions were improper, and in our opinion the court exercised a reasonable control over the entire examination. Section 2044, Code Civ. Proc.

[5] 5. In conclusion it is urged that:

"Defendant's counsel are of the opinion that the court misinstructed the jury in matters of law in giving them any instruction as to robbery. As an abstract proposition of law, the instruction may be right, but in this case there is no evidence to warrant the court in instructing the jury that the killing occurred in the perpetration, or an attempt to perpetrate, the crime of robbery. Of course, the district attorney advanced the theory, or in other words, created an atmosphere, that there was a motive for the crime; but there was no evidence in this case to show that Harry Garbutt had any motive for committing this act. There were innuendoes and insinuations, and there was some talk about diamonds and money disappearing; but there was no evidence at any time to show that Harry Garbutt took any diamonds or money from Dorothy Lee Hunn, or from any person in the Hunn house."

The theory of the prosecution was that the motive for the homicide was robbery; and though it may be conceded there is no direct evidence that a robbery was committed or actually attempted, nevertheless an instruction on robbery finds support in the record. For instance, there is evidence from which it might be inferred that, notwithstanding appellant's claim concerning the possession and disappearance of the $285, he was without funds the day of the homicide; and that his sudden departure from the bungalow was due in part to the apprehension that Frederick R. Gibson might return at any moment and find some of deceased's jewelry or other property on him; furthermore, he did not pay the cab driver who drove him to the Rosslyn Hotel, nor his bill at the Hayward Hotel before he and Irene Kirkoff left there.

In addition to what we have said concerning the asserted errors it will be seen that in any event no prejudice could have resulted, as the following condensed statement of the evidence surrounding the killing abundantly shows:

Frederick R. Gibson testified that after having eaten dinner he repaired to the bathroom, where he remained from 3 to 5 minutes, leaving the deceased and appellant alone in the kitchen; that the child had previously been put to bed; that while he was in the bathroom he heard "a great commotion, moving of chairs and so forth"; that he heard a shot and an outcry; that he went to the kitchen door but could not open it as it was "being held"; that he then went out the front door looking for help; that he went to the bungalow of a neighbor named Latham; that he and Latham went back and found the body of deceased in the runway and brought it into the house; that the police were summoned; that he could not see appellant when he heard the "commotion" and attempted to return to the kitchen; that he next saw him walking down the other side of Madison avenue and away from the residence of the deceased; that deceased had always worn and kept considerable jewelry about the house. On cross-examination he stated that he thought he saw a hammer on the floor.

C. D. Boaz, a hardware merchant, testified that on September 19, 1924, appellant purchased a hammer from him similar to the one exhibited by the district attorney and which was found in the home of the deceased after her death; that he thought he wrapped it in a newspaper; that a copy of the "Southwestern Retailer," of which he was a subscriber, which was shown to him as having been found in deceased's residence, was similar to the paper in which he wrapped the hammer.

Warren Olds, a taxi driver, testified that on September 19, 1924, he answered a call at the "Ice Company" about 8 o'clock in the evening of that day; that the passenger he picked up was appellant; that he took him to the Rosslyn Hotel; and that appellant entered the hotel without paying the fare and did not return.

Franklin W. Latham testified that he owned the property at number 90 North Madison Avenue; that deceased was a tenant of his; that he saw Gibson shortly after 7 o'clock on the evening of September 19, 1924; that upon being called by his wife he went with Gibson to the residence of deceased and found her body lying in a passageway close to her kitchen door; that there was blood on her head and face; that he and Gibson picked her up and took her into the living room; that he then attempted to restore her, thinking she had fainted; that a doctor was summoned; that in loosening deceased's clothing he noticed a bullet hole in her chest; that on examining the kitchen he found blood spots on the floor and on the refrigerator door; that the hammer exhibited to him he saw for the first time when the child handed it to him as he was stooping over the body of the deceased; that he picked up a piece of paper, similar to that shown him, and gave it to one of the officers; that deceased usually wore considerable jewelry, even at the time of her death. The witness' testimony was corroborated by that of his wife.

Marceline Keiser testified that she lived with her mother in a bungalow adjoining the Hunn residence; that they were home on the evening of September 19, 1924; that she heard a commotion in the kitchen of deceased's house; that she, her mother, and grandmother went out to their front porch; that Gibson rushed across their lawn and inquired if they had a man in the house; that he then ran to Latham's residence; that her mother went toward the passageway where the deceased was found lying; and that she went to the front door and was admitted by the child.

Georgia Keiser, mother of the preceding witness, gave corroborative testimony. Dr. Frederick A. Bonthius testified that having been summoned he went to the Hunn residence; that the deceased was dead when he arrived; that he found two scalp wounds, also a bullet hole in her chest; that, in his opinion, the deceased died from the bullet wound. Fanny E. Moorhouse, testified she was the aunt of appellant; that she introduced appellant to the deceased shortly after Christmas, 1923; that in a conversation he remarked to her that some "crook" would get the deceased's diamonds, because she "displayed" them so much.

Virginia Lee Hunn testified that on September 19, 1924, she came into the house about 6 o'clock in the evening, and there were present at the time "Uncle Frederick and mother and Mr. Garbutt"; that the four dined together; that she went to her room about 7 o'clock to retire; that the deceased accompanied her and later returned to the kitchen; that while she (Virginia) was in bed she saw Gibson go to the bathroom; that she then "heard a bang and a lot of noise out in the kitchen, and I was kind of scared"; that Gibson went from the bathroom toward the dining room; that he came back and went out the front door; that two or three seconds later appellant went to the davenport in the living room, picked up his cap and "ran out the front door"; that she picked up a hammer, partly wrapped, in the kitchen; that she tore the paper off; and that appellant did not go into the bathroom that night.

Paul Ging testified that he was employed at the Baltimore Hotel; that appellant had been a guest of the hotel, and he had met him there; that on a Friday evening, he could not give the exact date, between 10 and 10:30 o'clock, appellant came to where he was working and borrowed $3 from him, leaving an automatic gun as security; that he later turned the gun over to the police and recognized it as the gun shown to him in court.

Irene Kirkoff testified that she and appellant had been living together at the Hayward Hotel; that he came into the room where she was reading in bed after 7 o'clock in the evening of September 19, 1924, and told her to dress and pack as they were leaving because he was unable to pay the hotel bill; that before leaving he changed his suit; that a gun shown to her was similar to one possessed by the appellant; that after leaving the Hayward Hotel they went to the Earl Hotel and remained there Saturday night; that Saturday morning appellant sent her for a newspaper; that on the following night they stopped "at the hotel on Sixth or Seventh street"; that they returned to the Earl Hotel on Monday night, and that appellant was arrested on Tuesday; that on Sunday, preceding his arrest, he directed her to leave the state.

Leon Scheuhl, a detective sergeant, testified that he wrote and transcribed shorthand correctly; that after the arrest of appellant, in the presence of other officers and the district attorney, appellant freely, voluntarily, and without duress or pressure made a statement, which the witness took down in shorthand and transcribed; the witness then read the statement to the jury in which appellant referred to the dinner at the deceased's residence on the evening of her death; stated that he went to the bathroom and while there heard a commotion in the kitchen; that he returned to the kitchen and found Gibson beating the deceased about the head with some instrument; that he interfered to stop the trouble; that he reached for a gun in his pocket; that Gibson grabbed his hand, causing the gun to discharge; that he was not aware the bullet struck the deceased; that Gibson fled; that he followed after him to the street, but he was lost to view; that being an "ex-con" he became "panicky," and for that reason walked rapidly away from the scene of the scuffle; that he called a cab; that he rode to the Rosslyn Hotel; that he entered the hotel without paying his fare and left by a side exit; that he repaired to the Hayward Hotel, changed his suit, and went to the Earl Hotel for the night. The statement went on to detail his other movements up to the time of his arrest. A "joint" statement of Gibson and appellant, made at the deceased's residence in the presence of each other and the police officers, was read, in which each related the highly contradictory versions already set forth.

Robert E. O'Rourke, a police officer, testified that he arrested appellant on September 23, 1924, as he emerged from a rooming house; that upon his arrest he gave the name of "Hanson"; that on the way down the street, he stated, "Well, I am Harry Connors;" that he found a couple of pawn tickets in a bill folder in the possession of appellant; that in another conversation appellant said that on the evening of the homicide in pulling the gun out of his pocket he lost $285; that this sum had been "slipped" to him by the deceased the day of the homicide because he delivered to her a small package of diamonds which he received from a "fellow" in San Diego.

The appellant, appearing as a witness on his own behalf, told a story substantially in accord with the "statement" read into the record by Officer Scheuhl. He admitted that the statement, as read, was "substantially true," and that there was nothing in it he desired to "correct"; that from the time he arrived in California until the death of the deceased he had not been employed; that the story he told Officer O'Rourke concerning the $285 was false, and that, in fact, he had received the $285 from a "bootlegger," with whom he had "invested" $300, and that he told this falsehood to protect the "bootlegger."

It is apparent from the evidence that the jury must have discarded appellant's account of the murder, and, in view of our disposition of the asserted errors, there is no merit in the appeal.

The judgment and order appealed from are hereby affirmed.

POULTRY PRODUCERS OF CENTRAL CALIFORNIA, Inc., v. NILSSON.
(Sac. 3117.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1925.)

1. Agriculture ⟸6—Term "hens" in stock subscription agreement construed as including hens and pullets.

In a subscription agreement, whereby plaintiff agreed to purchase stock on the basis of one share for every 1,000 hens owned by him, a finding by the trial court that for the purposes for which the corporation was organized the term "hens" included hens and pullets was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Hen.]

2. Corporations ⟸81—Subscription to entire capital stock ordinarily not necessary to fix liability of subscribers, but where incorporation is conditioned on subscription to certain amount, unauthorized subscriptions cannot be counted.

Ordinarily, it is not a condition precedent to the liability of subscribers that entire capital stock be first subscribed, but where organization of corporation is made conditional on securing a certain amount of subscriptions, unauthorized subscriptions cannot be counted in making up required amount.

3. Agriculture ⟸6—Stock subscriptions by holders of minority fraction of 1,000 hens held proper under subscription agreement.

A provision in a subscription agreement for purchase of one share of stock for every 1,000 hens or a majority fraction of 1,000 owned by each subscriber, the minimum subscription in any event being one share where corporation was organized to include every producer in marketable quantities of hens, refers to basis for issuance of stock, and is not a limitation on those entitled to subscribe, so that subscriptions by holders of minority fractions of 1,000 hens were proper.

4. Agriculture ⟸6—Condition of produce sale agreement attached to stock subscription agreement as to number of signers necessary held complied with.

Condition in produce sale agreement attached to subscription agreement, requiring corporation to secure contracts from owners of at least 1,000,000, hens is complied with where sufficient number signed subscription agreement, though owners of less than 1,000,000 signed the produce sale agreements, since subscription signers, being under a duty to sign such produce sale agreements, they are regarded as signed under maxim laid down in Civ. Code, § 3529.

5. Agriculture ⇐6—Objection that produce sale agreement differed from one agreed to be signed held too late.

Where defendant who had agreed to sign a produce sale agreement was sent a copy which differed somewhat from the one attached to his subscription agreement, but to which no objections were made during the negotiations, he cannot raise such objection for the first time at the trial, since if made timely it could have been cured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Suit by the Poultry Producers of Central California, Inc., against J. Leonard Nilsson. From a decree granting specific performance and awarding damages for breach of contract, defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Dozier & Dozier, J. E. Pemberton, and Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sapiro, Neylan & Ehrlich, Sapiro, Levy & Hayes, and Sapiro & Hayes, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, J. The defendant has appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, decreeing specific performance and awarding damages for violation of a contract. Plaintiff was a nonprofit association organized and incorporated for the purpose of fostering and promoting the business of raising poultry and marketing eggs and poultry by co-operative methods. Defendant signed a preliminary subscription agreement with a large number of other poultry producers, providing for the organization of the association, and agreed to purchase 4 shares of its capital stock, at a price of $10 per share, and on the basis of one share for every 1,000 hens, or a majority fraction of 1,000 hens, owned by him. At the time he signed the subscription agreement he paid $10, representing 25 per cent. of the price of the stock subscribed for, which advance payment in accordance with the terms of the agreement, was to be credited on the purchase price of the stock when the organization of the association was completed. There was attached to the subscription agreement, when signed by the defendant and the other subscribers, a form of "produce sale agreement," by the terms of which it was provided that, in consideration of the mutual obligations therein contained and of the agreements by each of the parties thereto to be performed and in pursuance of the preliminary [subscription] agreement, the association agreed to purchase and market, and the subscriber agreed to sell and deliver to it such of the eggs and poultry produced by him during the years 1917, 1918, and 1919 as the defendant intended "to sell or market in any event," under the conditions thereinafter set out.

Among other provisions contained in the form of the proposed produce sale agreement was one to the effect that, as it would be impracticable and extremely difficult to determine the actual damage resulting to the buyer association should the seller fail to deliver to it the eggs and poultry agreed to be delivered, the seller agreed to pay to the buyer 5 cents for each dozen eggs, and $1 for each dozen commercial poultry sold, consigned or marketed by or for him and not delivered to the buyer, as liquidated damages for the breach of the produce sale agreement in that regard.

The plaintiff association was subsequently incorporated, and commenced carrying on the business for which it was formed; but the defendant refused to sign the produce sale agreement when requested to do so, and thereafter sold 27,690 dozen eggs in violation of its terms. The association thereupon commenced this action to compel the defendant to execute the produce sale agreement and to specifically perform the same, and for liquidated damages for its breach. It alleged generally and specifically that it and the other subscribers had fully performed all the conditions of the subscription agreement and of the produce sale agreement, which the defendant had agreed to execute. The various allegations of the complaint being controverted by the defendant in his answer, trial was had, at the conclusion of which judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and requiring the defendant to forthwith execute and deliver to the plaintiff duplicate copies of the produce sale agreement, and to specifically perform the same. It was further ordered that an injunction issue restraining the defendant from selling any eggs produced by him to persons other than the plaintiff association, and that plaintiff recover the sum of $1,384.50 liquidated damages for violation of the terms of the produce sale agreement, and the further sum of $30 unpaid balance due on the defendant's stock subscription. From that judgment, and the whole thereof, the defendant has appealed.

The action was tried and decided before the decision of this court in the case of Poultry Producers of Southern California v. Barlow, 189 Cal. 278, 208 P. 93, and of the District Court of Appeal in Poultry Producers, etc., v. Murphy, 64 Cal. App. 450, 221 P. 962. The appellant contends, and the respondent admits, that the decision in the Barlow Case is controlling as to, and overrules that portion of the judgment in the present case which decrees specific performance of the produce sale agreement, and permanently enjoins the defendant from delivering eggs produced by him to others than the association. Respondent concedes that there must be a reversal of that portion of the judgment of the trial court, and it will be so ordered.

In Poultry Producers v. Barlow, supra, this court held that, although the plaintiff was not entitled to specific performance of the produce sale agreement there under consideration, and which had been signed by the subscriber, either directly or indirectly, it was entitled to judgment for damages suffered by it by reason of the breach of the defendant. Subsequently the identical contract in controversy here was considered by the District Court of Appeal in Poultry Producers, etc., v. Murphy, supra. In that case, as in this, the subscriber for the stock of the association refused to sign the produce sale agreement, and sold eggs in violation of its terms. The court in that case, following the decision of this court in the Barlow Case held that the promise of the defendant to sign the produce sale agreement was valid and enforceable, and affirmed the judgment of the lower court directing defendant to sign the same, awarding the plaintiff liquidated damages for failure to deliver eggs in accordance with the terms of such agreement, and for the balance due on the subscription for the stock. See, also, Anaheim Citrus Fruit Ass'n v. Yeoman, 51 Cal. App. 759, 197 P. 959; Co-operative Egg, etc., Co. v. Taylor, 122 Wash. 466, 210 P. 806; Tobacco Growers' Co-op. Ass'n v. Jones, 185 N. C. 265, 117 S. E. 174, 33 A. L. R. 231. Questions are raised on the appeal in this case, however, which were not advanced or considered in any of the above decisions.

Appellant's primary contention is that bona fide subscriptions of stock to the amount of $10,000, subject to the express conditions of the subscription agreement, were not procured before the respondent corporation was organized. By the terms of the subscription agreement, the signers agreed to purchase shares of stock in the association to be formed at the rate of one share for every 1,000 hens, or a majority fraction of 1,000 hens, owned by such subscribers, respectively, the minimum subscription in any event being one share. It was further provided that when bona fide subscribers to the capital stock of the corporation to the amount of $10,000 of stock should be procured, subject to the conditions in the agreement stated, the market director of the state of California should notify all the subscribers, and the subscription agreement should thereupon go into full force and effect, and the corporation should thereupon be immediately organized by the subscribers, who agreed to execute "at the proper time to be determined by the directors of the corporation agreements with the corporation for the sale of their products by the said corporation, in terms substantially the same as those set forth in the form of agreements" attached to the subscription agreement. There was a final provision in the subscription agreement that if bona fide subscriptions to the stock of the corporation to the total amount of $10,000 should not be procured by January 1, 1917, the obligation of the subscribers should cease and terminate, and all expenditures necessarily or properly incurred in the preliminary work of organizing the corporation should be prorated between the subscribers in their respective proportions, and the balance divided and returned to them.

[1, 2] Following the stipulated facts, the trial court found that subscribers who owned only a minority fraction (italics are ours) of 1,000 hens, laying pullets, and nonlaying pullets, were permitted to subscribe for one share of stock each, and that the total subscriptions to the stock of the corporation were sufficient to allow for its organization on October 30, 1916. Appellant first offers the suggestion that subscriptions for stock were limited to the owners of "hens," and that "pullets" should not have been included in arriving at the number of "hens" a subscriber had. Considerable evidence was introduced on the subject, from which the trial court might well conclude that, for the purposes for which the corporation was organized, the term "hens," as used in the provisions of the subscription contracts, included hens and pullets. We are satisfied to accept the trial court's finding on that subject. The contention that the terms of the subscription agreement were violated when the owners of "minority fractions" of 1,000 hens were permitted to become stockholders in the respondent corporation presents a more vital question. "Ordinarily it is not a condition precedent to the liability of subscribers that the full sum should be first subscribed, where there is nothing in the agreement to that effect; nor is it ordinarily a condition precedent to the formation of the corporation or consummation of the contract of membership that the entire capital provided by the articles or charter be subscribed. But conditions may be inserted in the contract making the organization of the proposed corporation conditional upon the securing of subscriptions for a certain amount. In such cases, unauthorized subscriptions cannot be counted in making up the requisite amount to be subscribed before organization." 6 Cal. Jur. p. 766, par. 172.

[3] The exact provision in the subscription agreement, following the clause wherein the producers agree to subscribe for the capital stock of the corporation, is as follows:

"It is further understood and agreed that we and each of us will purchase and we do hereby subscribe to and agree to purchase said shares of such stock at the rate of one share for every thousand hens or a majority fraction of a thousand hens owned by each subscriber, the minimum subscription in any event being one share."

Were it not for the concluding phrase, "the minimum subscription in any event being one share," and our understanding of the purposes for which the corporation was formed, we would be inclined to accept the view of appellant that only those producers owning at least a "majority fraction" of 1,000 hens were to become shareholders in the corporation. His argument finds some support in the finding of the trial court that, preliminary to the organization of the respondent, investigation by the State Market Commission and the organization committee of poultry producers established that the marketing of the products of at least 1,000,000 hens would be essential before the corporation could secure for the producers, who were about to become members, the substantial benefits of collective marketing and co-operative methods of handling eggs and poultry products. From this fact as a premise, appellant attempts to show that the sale of shares of stock to the amount required by the agreement, to producers owning at least a "majority fraction" of 1,000 hens, based on the "law of averages," would probably result in securing subscriptions and produce sale agreements from the owners of 1,000,000 hens. The condition in the agreement was therefore a limitation, appellant contends, under which producers having less than 500 hens were not eligible to become stockholders, and the phrase, "the minimum subscription in any event being one share," means that a share could not be divided into fractions.

It is respondent's contention that this clause is to be interpreted as merely referring to the rate or basis for the issuance of stock, and is not a limitation upon those who are entitled to subscribe; and that the contract taken as a whole should be interpreted to mean that those who own hens up to the number of 1,000 are entitled to subscribe for and receive one share of stock, and that those who own hens in excess of 1,000, to the extent of a majority fraction thereof, shall be entitled to subscribe for an additional share or shares of stock. The essential objects underlying the formation of the poultry producers into a co-operative association in this case, if we are to judge from the findings, were the inclusion, so far as practicable, of every producer in marketable quantities of the particular product in the vicinity, and a resultant control and stabilization of the market for their products. We may readily assume that these objects might be seriously interfered with if there were any considerable number of producers owning 500 hens, or less, in the neighborhood. We may infer, therefore, as the trial court must have done, that it was the purpose of the promoters of the enterprise to include within the organization the smaller producers as well as the larger owners of poultry, the "minimum subscription in any event being one share," and the larger subscriptions being based on the number of hens the particular subscriber owned. The subscription contract is susceptible of an interpretation which would conform to these essential purposes. It contains no provision expressly limiting subscribers to those who own 1,000 hens or at least a majority fraction of that number. The trial court, whose duty it was in the first instance to construe the provision, has accepted the view placed on the agreement by the respondent, and we are not disposed to hold that its interpretation of the contract was incorrect. It follows, therefore, that the contention of appellant that bona fide subscriptions to the stock of the respondent corporation were not procured pursuant to the provisions of the subscription agreement cannot be sustained.

[4] Appellant advances another reason why he should not be held in damages for his failure to sell his poultry products to the respondent in keeping with the provisions of the produce sale agreement. His contention rests upon the fact that the owners of at least 1,000,000 hens did not sign the produce sale agreement by January 1, 1917. In the proposed form of that agreement, attached to and forming a part of the subscription agreement, it was provided that, in the event the respondent failed to secure by January 1, 1917, contracts similar in terms from the owners of at least 1,000,000 hens, the sales contract should be null and void, and no obligation should be enforceable thereunder. The trial court found that while the producers who executed the subscription agreement were the several owners, collectively, of 667,284 hens, 169,052 laying pullets, and 169,052 nonlaying pullets, making a total of 1,005,388 hens, laying pullets, and nonlaying pullets, and actually subscribed for capital stock of the corporation to the amount of $10,000, the owners of approximately only 200,000 fowls actually and physically signed and executed produce sale agreements prior to the 1st day of January, 1917. The owners of some 600,000 fowls signed after that date, and the owners of about 200,000 have never executed the agreements. Respondent contends that, as producers owning more than 1,000,000 hens, including pullets, signed the subscription agreement before January 1, 1917, the condition contained in the draft of the proposed produce sale agreement had been met. That is not physically and literally the fact, but the situation existing was, so far as the record discloses, due to no fault of the respondant, but was due entirely to the failure of the defendant and other subscribers to perform their duty of signing the sales contracts. The trial court found that if they had so performed that duty the association would have had by January 1, 1917, contracts from the owners of 1,000,000 hens. It is a maxim of jurisprudence that "that which ought to have been done is to be regarded as done, in favor of him to whom, and against him from whom, performance is due." Civ. Code, § 3529. Equity looks upon things agreed to be done as though they were actually performed, "the true meaning of which is that equity will treat the subject-matter as to collateral consequences and incidents in the same manner as if the final acts contemplated by the parties had been executed exactly as they ought to have been." Daggett v. Rankin, 31 Cal. 321, 327; Beverly v. Blackwood, 102 Cal. 83, 91, 36 P. 378; Poultry Producers v. Murphy, supra. The produce sale agreement which appellant agreed to sign, by which he contracted to sell his products to respondent, was a valid one. If it had been executed, and its terms breached, respondent would have been entitled to damages suffered by it by reason of the breach—in this case the liquidated damages fixed by the agreement itself. Poultry Producers, etc., v. Barlow, supra. The produce sale agreement ought to have been signed. It may now be regarded in equity as having been properly executed.

[5] Appellant has offered, in defense of his refusal to sign the produce sale agreement, the contention that the terms of the agreement he was asked to sign were not "substantially the same" as those set forth in the form of agreement attached to the subscription agreement. When respondent was ready to begin transacting business, its secretary notified the defendant to that effect some time prior to January 1, 1917, and requested payment of the balance due on his stock subscription, at the same time sending him, and requesting that he sign, what purported to be substantially a reprint of the original produce sale agreement. The provision relating to the securing of similar contracts from the owners of 1,000,000 hens was omitted from the draft, and in a few minor details it otherwise differed from the original. In response to the demand appellant went to San Francisco, some time after the first of the year, and met representatives of the respondent in conference over the matter. At that meeting he offered no objection to the manner in which the subscriptions had been secured, or the corporation formed, or to the form of the instrument offered for his signature. He declined to execute the produce sale agreement, assigning as his sole reason for such refusal that it called for the sale to the corporation of all eggs and poultry produced by him, when he had in fact, he contended, only agreed to sell to it any surplus of such products as he might desire to dispose of after selling to others. Claiming to have contracts with others for the sale of his poultry products, he offered to sell to the corporation any surplus he might have after supplying his customers, a proposition he repeated in his answer filed in this action. At some time during the negotiations he tendered, and offered to pay respondent the unpaid balance of the purchase price of the stock. The trial court found against the contention that the agreement did not embody appellant's real contract with the respondent for the sale of his products to it. As to the objection first made during the trial that the contract differed in other particulars from the one attached to the subscription agreement, appellant should have made those objections when the instrument was offered to him for execution. It is too late for him to now seek to take advantage of matters which, assuming the objections to have been good if timely made, could have been easily cured at the time.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the portion decreeing specific performance of the produce sale agreement and granting an injunction to prevent the breach of its terms. In all other respects the judgment is affirmed.

HUNTER v. McKENZIE et ux. (L. A. 8061.)

1. Contracts ⟸136—Fraud of plaintiff held not to deprive him of cause of action in contract for exchange of property; doctrine of "pari delicto" applying only to contracts intrinsically illegal or contrary to public policy.

In action for deceit growing out of an exchange of property, where the defendant elected to stand on the contract, constructive fraud of plaintiffs in including in exchange property he had theretofore sold to another held not to deprive him of a cause of action under doctrine of pari delicto, preventing recovery, where both parties are guilty of fraud, since such doctrine applies only to contracts intrinsically illegal or contrary to public policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, In Pari Delicto.]

2. Fraud ⟸25—Damage essential element.

In action for deceit answer setting up fraud of plaintiff with no showing that defendant has been damaged by such fraud is not a defense.

3. Fraud ⟸36—Set-off and counterclaim ⟸34(3)—Fraud of plaintiff may be set up as counterclaim in mitigation, but not as bar.

Where both parties to a contract for exchange of properties have been guilty of fraud, the defendant may set up the plaintiff's fraud as a counterclaim, or by way of set-off or recoupment, but not as a bar to plaintiff's cause of action.

4. Fraud ⊂⊃21—Fraudulent representation held intended to induce wife as well as husband, though not made directly to her.

In action for deceit by plaintiff and as administrator for his wife, evidence that false representations were made in presence of both plaintiff and wife, who was a necessary party, though not participating, warranted inference that representations were intended as inducement to her to make exchange of property, under rule that false representations need not be made directly to party relying thereon to support an action for fraud.

5. Fraud ⊂⊃58(4)—Requested instruction there was no evidence of reliance on false representation properly refused.

In action for deceit by plaintiff and as administrator for his wife, where evidence warranted inference that wife, in joining in exchange of property, relied on false representations of defendant, a requested instruction that in absence of evidence of reliance by wife to find against her was properly refused, under rule that such reliance may be inferred from surrounding circumstances.

6. Fraud ⊂⊃65(1)—Instruction on executed contract proper, where executory contract became executed by defendants' action.

In action for deceit in inducing exchange of property, instruction that measure of damages is difference between actual value of property and value represented is not objectionable as being for an executed, not an executory, contract, where contract, though executory in its inception, became executed by partition proceedings instituted by defendant.

7. Trial ⊂⊃255(9)—Failure to instruct as to allowance to defendants for expenditures in removing incumbrances held not error, where not requested, and some evidence of payment by plaintiff.

In action for deceit in exchange of property, failure to instruct that allowance is to be made for money expended by defendant in releasing incumbrances on property transferred by plaintiff was not error, where no request for such instruction was made, and there was evidence showing incumbrances to have been paid by plaintiff.

8. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—Finding by jury, under proper instructions, as to circumstances of signing of paper in which plaintiff's admitted satisfaction precluded its consideration on appeal.

In action for deceit in exchange of property, where evidence was in dispute as to how a signed statement by plaintiffs to the effect that they had examined the property and were satisfied, was obtained, and court instructed that burden of proof was on plaintiffs, and if defendant's evidence were true to find for defendant, a finding by jury for plaintiffs precludes a further consideration on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Lewis C. Hunter, individually and as administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Alma J. Hunter, deceased, against William E. McKenzie and wife, for damages for false representations. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Victor T. Watkins and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an action for damages for deceit. It arises out of an agreement for the exchange of real properties. Briefly stated, the facts pleaded in plaintiff's complaint are these: In June, 1920, at Detroit, Mich., the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, and his wife, Alma J. Hunter, who has since died, entered into a written contract with the defendants, William E. McKenzie and his wife, Minnie B. McKenzie, for the exchange of several parcels of real property owned by the Hunters, situated in the city of Detroit, for a one-half interest in improved real property, situated in the city of Los Angeles, owned by the McKenzies and known as the Fowler apartments. Upon the consummation of the agreement, the Hunters took possession and assumed full control of the said Fowler apartments. Certain false representations as to the value of the property situated in Los Angeles and the income thereof, the value of the furniture therein, the cost of operating the same, and the amount of the taxes levied and assessed against the said property were made by the defendant, William E. McKenzie, acting for himself and as the agent of his wife, to the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, and his wife, Alma J. Hunter, for the purpose of inducing the Hunters to make the exchange. Such representations were known by the defendants to be false at the time they were made. At the time of the negotiation and execution of the contract in controversy, Hunter and his wife were in very poor health and desired to come to California. Prior to the negotiation and execution of the contract of exchange, the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, and his wife had known the defendant, William E. McKenzie, for many years and they relied upon his representations and statements concerning the property in suit and believed him to be a man of honesty and integrity. The Hunters relied wholly upon the representations of the defendant, McKenzie, and the said representations were the inducing cause which prompted the Hunters to enter into the contract. Aside from the representations of the defendant, William E. McKenzie, the Hunters had no knowledge of property values in the state of California, nor any knowledge of the value and condition of the particular property situated in Los Angeles and which was proffered in exchange by the defendants. The property conveyed to the defendants by the Hunters in consummation of the contract was of the fair and reasonable value it was represented by them to be when the contract was being negotiated. The plaintiffs have paid to the defendants all sums due and payable upder the terms of the contract of exchange and have been ready and willing at all times to perform all of the terms and covenants of said contract.

The answer of the defendants denies all of the material allegations of the complaint, and as a special defense alleges, in substance, that the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, and his wife signed a written statement subsequent to the consummation of the contract, to the effect that they had examined the Los Angeles property and found the same to be as represented by the defendants and that they were perfectly satisfied with the transaction; that the plaintiff had represented that all of the properties situated in Detroit, which were conveyed to defendants in consummation of the contract, were owned by the plaintiff and were free of incumbrances, whereas, in truth and in fact, one lot or parcel of land included in said Detroit property prior to the negotiation and consummation of the contract had been conveyed to another person; that title to said lot was not in the plaintiff, Hunter, nor his wife immediately before and at the time of the consummation of the contract. Defendants' answer further alleged in support of the pleaded special defense, and by way of counterclaim, that certain abstracts had not been furnished, as required by the contract, and that some of the property conveyed by the Hunters was incumbered by unsatisfied mechanics' liens and tax liens. Finally it was alleged upon behalf of the defendants that on August 15, 1920, there was a full settlement and adjustment of the differences existing between the parties to the contract, with full knowledge at that time, on the part of the Hunters, concerning the actual value and condition of the property proffered in exchange by the defendants. The defendants prayed that the plaintiff take nothing by the action, and that the defendants have judgment against the plaintiff for the sum needed to release the mechanics' and tax liens, which rested upon a part of the Detroit property conveyed to the defendants.

The cause was tried before a jury. Much evidence was adduced pro and con in response to the issues made by the pleadings. There is a substantial conflict in the evidence adduced upon the whole case concerning the value and income of the Los Angeles property. And the evidence is likewise in conflict concerning the settlement which was alleged to have been made prior to the filing of the suit, and so is the evidence in conflict as to what was said and done by all of the parties to the contract subsequent to its consummation and subsequent to the arrival of the Hunters in Los Angeles. The evidence shows, however, without conflict that the Hunters, prior to the time of the negotiation and consummation of the contract, conveyed by grant deed a certain lot of land, of the approximate value of $800, to certain persons, viz., A. W. and J. J. Shupe. Said lot was included in the several parcels of land situated in Detroit which had been conveyed by the Hunters to the defendants in exchange for the latters' property in Los Angeles. At the time the exchange was consummated, the Hunters did not have title to this particular lot of land. It was explained, however, by the plaintiff, Lewis C. Huntter, who had been called as a witness in his own behalf and when testifying upon cross-examination, that he had inadvertently failed to note the transfer of the lot in question to the Shupes on the map of lands, which he owned in Detroit; that the said lot ever since then has been assessed to him; that at all times since then he paid the taxes thereon and that at the time he entered into the negotiations with the defendants for the exchange, and at the time of the exchange, he had forgotten the transfer to the Shupes. Upon the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $25,000, which impliedly found the pleaded and evidentiary facts of the plaintiff's case to be true, judgment was entered for the plaintiff, from which the defendants have appealed.

[1] The primary point presented in support of the appeal is that the trial court refused, at the request of the defendants, to charge the jury, in effect, that the Hunters, at the time they were negotiating the exchange in question, were bound to know, and in law were conclusively presumed to know, that they had theretofore conveyed one of the lots of land involved in the exchange to the Schupes, and that their failure to advise the defendant, William E. McKenzie, of that fact, coupled with the fact that they had included said lot in the list of properties which they proffered for exchange, was, as a matter of fact, a fraud, concealment, and deceit which deprived the plaintiff of a right of action for damages arising out of the facts pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint, and that because of the making of the conveyance of said lot to the Shupes the verdict of the jury must be for the defendants and against the plaintiff. Three other instructions similar in purpose and effect were requested by the defendants and refused by the trial judge. Conceding without deciding that the proposed instructions correctly stated the law upon the subject of fraud and concealment resulting from misrepresentations negligently and carelessly, even though innocently, made, they were not applicable to the situation presented by the pleadings and proof in the instant case. The plaintiff's cause of action, as pleaded, was one for damages arising out of false and fraudulent representations alleged to have been made by the defendants, and which it was alleged were the inducing cause of the Hunters entering into the contract. The plaintiff was not seeking a rescission of the contract, but rather was standing upon the contract and seeking only damages resulting from the fraud which induced its making. The defendants, it will be noted, were likewise standing upon the contract and did not, by any pleading, appropriate or otherwise, seek a rescission of the contract. Their defense as pleaded was, in substance and effect, merely that the plaintiff and his wife had perpetrated a fraud upon them by misrepresentations concerning their title in and to one of the lots of land which they had proffered in exchange for the defendants' Los Angeles property, and that therefore, even though they had perpetrated the pleaded fraud upon the Hunters, all of the parties to the transaction were in pari delicto in the consummation of a fraudulent transaction, and consequently the law would not afford relief to any of the parties, but would leave them where it found them.

[2] Moreover, while the alleged fraud of the Hunters was pleaded as a defense to the action, there was no allegation in the answer of the defendants nor was there any showing in the proof adduced by the defendants upon the trial of the case that they were in anywise damaged by the misrepresentations of the Hunters, and fraud without damage is not a defense. Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 P. 58. The numerous cases cited by counsel for appellants do not sustain their contention that the doctrine of pari delicto has application to the situation presented by the pleadings and the evidence in the instant case. It is needless to enter upon a detailed discussion of those cases. It will suffice to say that those cases, generally speaking, may be segregated into two classes, viz.: Those which deal with the doctrine of pari delicto only where the parties to a contract, intrinsically illegal, are shown to be equally at fault in the making of the contract; or where the contract in suit is based upon considerations contrary to public policy. The contract in question here, obviously, was one which the parties thereto might lawfully enter into and, clearly, no question of the violation of public policy was involved in its making. The question, consequently, of whether or not the parties to the contract are in pari delicto is not pertinent to the case in hand. McDonald v. Pacific Debenture Co., 146 Cal. 667, 80 P. 1090.

[3] We have, then, before us a case in which the pleadings and the proof show merely an action for damages resulting from the alleged fraudulent representations of the defendants which was met by the defendants, without repudiating the contract, by the defense, imperfectly pleaded, that the Hunters were also guilty of a fraudulent misrepresentation. It is the general rule that if one party to a contract, during the negotiation thereof, perpetrates an actionable fraud upon the other party to the contract concerning the subject-matter of the contract, the latter party, even though he does not seek to exercise his right to repudiate the contract on the discovery of the fraud, may recoup his damages therefor in any action brought by the guilty party for damages resulting from the alleged false and fraudulent representations of the latter party to the contract. 1 Sutherland on Damages, § 179 (4th Ed.); Holton v. Noble, supra; Barbour v. Flick, 126 Cal. 628, 59 P. 122; Chandler v. Childs, 42 Mich. 128, 3 N. W. 297; Carey v. Guillow, 105 Mass. 18, 7 Am. Rep. 494.

Conceding, for the purpose of discussion, that the Hunters' misrepresentation as to their title to one of the lots involved in the exchange was tantamount in law to the perpetration of an actionable fraud upon the defendants, it may be further conceded that if the defendants had properly pleaded that fact as a counterclaim, or by way of set-off or recoupment, they would have been entitled, had they so requested, to an instruction from the trial court directing the jury to take into consideration the claimed fraud of the Hunters and the value of the lot in question, not for the purpose of impairing the plaintiff's right of recovery, but merely in mitigation of the damages, if any, shown to have been suffered by the Hunters as the result of the alleged false and fraudulent representations of the defendants. This much and no more, even though the defense of recoupment had been pleaded and relied upon, was all that the defendants were entitled to in the charge of the court, and not having requested such a charge they will not now be heard to complain.

[4] It is not disputed that the evidence upon the entire case is sufficient to support the verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter. It is insisted, however, that there is no evidence in the record sufficiently supporting the judgment in favor of said Lewis C. Hunter as administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of his deceased wife. The answer to this contention is to be found in the record before us, which shows much evidence to the effect that the false representations alleged and relied upon for the plaintiff's cause of action, and upon which the verdict and judgment may be said to be largely rested, were made by the defendant, William E. McKenzie, to the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, in the presence of his wife during the preliminary negotiations which culminated in the contract in controversy. While Mrs. Hunter apparently did not participate in the conversations constituting these negotiations, and while it does not appear that such conversations were directly addressed to her, nevertheless, she was an interested and a necessary party to the negotiations, and it may be fairly inferred from the evidence, adduced upon this phase of the case, that the alleged misrepresentations were addressed to and were intended as a matter of inducement to her as well as to her husband. While some connection, of course, direct or indirect, between the party charged with making the false representations and the party relying thereon must be shown, it is not essential, however, in support of a cause of action for damages resulting from false representations that the false representations be shown to have been made directly to the party claiming to have relied upon them. Carvill v. Jacks, Adm'r, 43 Ark. 454; Alexander v. Beresford, 27 Miss. 747, 61 Am. Dec. 538.

[5] Upon this phase of the case, it is insisted further that there is no evidence that Mrs. Hunter relied upon the alleged false representations made to her husband in her presence and that, therefore, the cause of action pleaded and prosecuted in her behalf must fail. Of course it is incumbent upon the party seeking to recover in an action for deceit, founded upon false representations, to show that he relied upon and was influenced by them. True, there is no direct evidence showing that Mrs. Hunter relied and acted upon the alleged and found false representations, still it was not essential to a cause of action in her behalf to produce direct evidence that she relied upon such false representations. The fact of reliance upon alleged false representations may be inferred from the circumstances attending the transaction which oftentimes afford much stronger and more satisfactory evidence of the inducement which prompted the party defrauded to enter into the contract than his direct testimony to the same effect. Lucas v. Crippen, 76 Iowa, 507, 41 N. W. 205; Taylor v. Guest, 58 N. Y. 262; Baker v. Hallam, 103 Iowa, 43, 72 N. W. 419; Kline v. Baker, 106 Mass. 61; Hatch v. Spooner, 59 Hun, 625, 13 N. Y. S. 642. We are satisfied that it may be fairly inferred from the evidence concerning the nature of the transaction in suit, the relation of the parties, and the circumstances surrounding the entire transaction as shown by the record before us, that Mrs. Hunter relied upon and was induced to enter into the contract in question by the false representations of the defendant. It follows from what we have just said that there was no error, as is contended on behalf of the defendants, in the refusal of the trial court to give the instruction requested on behalf of the defendants, to the effect that there was no evidence in the case of any kind as to what influenced Mrs. Hunter to enter into the contract of exchange in question and that, therefore, the verdict of the jury, regardless of what it might be as to the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, must be in favor of the defendants as against Lewis C. Hunter as administrator.

[6] The trial court in its charge to the jury instructed, in effect, that the measure of the plaintiff's damages, if any, was the difference between the actual value of the property proffered and passed in exchange to the Hunters by the defendants and its value, had it been as represented by the defendants. It is conceded that the instruction referred to correctly states the law, as enunciated in Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 P. 729, when applied, in actions for damages for deceit, to executed contracts, but it is insisted that it has no application to the measure of damages in the instant case, because the contract in suit was executory, to the extent that a final payment in the sum of $22,500, which, under the terms of the contract of exchange, was to be made in cash by the Hunters to the defendants, had never been paid by the Hunters. Assuming the contract of exchange to have been executory at its inception, still, in view of the situation developed by the evidence upon this phase of the case, we need not stop to discuss the question of what the measure of damages should be in actions for deceit arising out of executory contracts. In this behalf, the record shows the undisputed fact that, before the filing of the defendants' answer, and more than six months before the case came on for trial, the Fowler apartments had been partitioned and sold, in an action instituted by the defendants against the Hunters, and, at the partition sale, the defendant, William E. McKenzie, became the purchaser at the price of $150,000, of which $75,000 was paid in cash and the balance by the assumption of incumbrances against the property amounting to the sum of $75,000. It further sufficiently appears from the evidence that, as the result of said partition and sale, the defendants received in full the equivalent of the unpaid balance of $22,500, which was due to them from the Hunters under the terms of the contract of exchange.

It will thus be seen that the contract of exchange, even conceding it to have been executory at its inception, ultimately became by the enforced action of the defendants, in legal effect, an executed contract. It follows that the trial court's instruction to the jury concerning the measure of damages was correctly applied to the situation in hand at the time of the trial. That counsel for the defendants acquiesced at the time of the trial in this view is made manifest, we think, by the fact that no instruction concerning the measure of damages was requested upon behalf of the defendants based upon the theory that the contract in suit was executory.

[7] It is further contended, in effect, that the trial court erred to the prejudice of the defendants in failing to charge the jury that, when assessing the plaintiff's damages, they were to make proper allowance to the defendants for the moneys alleged to have been expended by them in releasing certain mortgage incumbrances and tax liens standing against the Detroit property at the time of the consummation of the contract of exchange. In response to this contention it will suffice, we think, to say that there is some evidence in the record, standing apparently undisputed, to the effect that said mortgage incumbrances and tax liens had been satisfied and this fact, doubtless, explains why counsel for the defendants failed to request an instruction covering the subject-matter of recoupment, and to which the defendants would have been entitled, if said mortgage incumbrances and tax liens had not in fact been satisfied.

[8] It is not disputed that the Hunters, subsequent to their arrival in Los Angeles, signed a statement to the effect that they had examined the Fowler apartments and found the same to be in every respect as represented by the defendant, William E. McKenzie, and that they were perfectly satisfied with the transaction. Supplementing the admission in evidence of said statement is the testimony of a witness for the defendants, who was in charge of the Fowler apartments on July 20, 1920, to the effect that the Hunters in the presence and hearing of the witness looked over the financial reports of the property for the previous month and expressed themselves as satisfied and anxious to take over the property immediately. In this connection, there was also the testimony of the defendant, William E. McKenzie, as to what was said and done at this time tending to support the allegations of the answer of the defendants upon this phase of the case. The testimony of the plaintiff, Lewis C. Hunter, in substance, was that the defendant, McKenzie, when he was about to leave Los Angeles for Detroit, presented the statement in question for the signatures of the Hunters; that Hunter thereupon told McKenzie that he, Hunter, had not had an opportunity to examine the property and because of ill health could not do so, whereupon McKenzie said he just wanted the statement for his files in Detroit and that he would guarantee that the Hunters would find everything to be just as he had represented. Relying upon these assurances, Hunter signed and prevailed upon his wife to sign the instrument in question. Upon this phase of the case, the court instructed the jury, in effect, that if they should find that the statement in question was signed under the conditions as claimed by the defendants in their answer, and as testified to by the witnesses for the defense, then their verdict should be for the defendants. In this connection the trial court also charged the jury that the burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff. The jury having, upon a substantial conflict in the evidence, resolved the issue in favor of the plaintiff, we are, therefore, precluded from a further consideration of the matter upon this appeal.

The remaining points, made in support of the appeal, do not require discussion.

BRAINARD v. ROGERS (GRADY, Intervener). (Civ. 4852.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Aug. 27, 1925.)

Garnishment ⊂=34—Interest, under insurance policy after fire, subject to; "owing," "debts."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 537 et seq., as to attachment, proceeds of fire insurance policy are subject to garnishment by insured's creditor after fire loss but before adjustment, and before proofs of loss necessary for action on the policy; "owing" and "debts" in the statute including immature obligations.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Debt; Owe.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by G. W. Brainard against Nick Rogers. From a portion of the judgment in favor of W. M. Grady, substituted for W. D. Grady, deceased, intervener, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Joseph Kirk, of San Francisco, and Elmore Winkler, of Fresno (Joseph A. Pritchard, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

W. T. Craig, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ.

M. K. Harris and James A. Burns, both of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action for goods sold and delivered. It was commenced on September 29, 1921, in a complaint filed against Nick Rogers, defendant. At that time, this defendant had sustained a complete loss by fire of his merchandise, furniture, and fixtures. The property destroyed was covered by two policies of fire insurance amounting to $5,000. When the complaint was filed, a writ of attachment was issued and the proceeds of the fire insurance policies in the hands of the insurers was garnished. Thereafter W. D. Grady intervened in the action and alleged that he was the assignee of the insurance moneys, and that, as such assignee, he had obtained a judgment by stipulation with the defendant Nick Rogers for $2,200 against the insurance company. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff against Nick Rogers in the full sum demanded in the complaint, but adjudged that the intervener was the owner of the insurance moneys garnished by the plaintiff and ordered them discharged from the lien of plaintiff's attachment. From this portion of the judgment in favor of the intervener, the plaintiff appeals, and the appeal is resisted by the intervener alone. The appeal is presented upon a record prepared under the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The sole question which is in issue on the appeal is: Are the proceeds of a fire insurance policy subject to garnishment at the instance of the creditor of the insured subsequent to a fire loss, but prior to an adjustment of that loss between the insurer and the insured? Our answer to this question is in the affirmative for the reasons which will follow.

The right to attach or garnish the property or interests of a debtor is purely statutory. The law of this state conferring the right and providing the procedure for the exercise thereof is found in sections 537 and following of the Code of Civil Procedure. In subdivision 5 of section 542, Code of Civil Procedure, where the duties of the sheriff in the execution of a writ of attachment are detailed, it is provided that debts and credits, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving "with the person owing such debts, or having in his possession, * * * such credits" a copy of the writ. In section 543, relating to the instructions to be given the sheriff by the plaintiff or his attorney, the levy is made to apply to any person who "has in his possession * * * any credits * * * belonging to the defendant, or is owing any debt to the defendant." Section 544, relating to the liability to the plaintiff of a garnishee, uses the language:

"All persons having in their possession * * * any credits * * * belonging to the defendant, or owing any debts to the defendant * * * shall be * * * liable to the plaintiff for the amount of such credits, property, or debts."

Similar language is used in section 545, relating to the procedure for citation to garnishee to appear before a court, where it provides that "any person owing debts to the defendant, or having in his possession, * * * any credits * * * belonging to the defendant, may be required to attend before the court * * * and be examined on oath respecting the same." It will be noted that throughout these sections the expression "belonging to" and "owing" are used in the disjunctive. But one conclusion may be drawn from this and that is that the Legislature intended to authorize the attachment of moneys which were owing the creditor as well as moneys and other properties belonging to the debtor which the garnishee then had in his possession. Looking at the Code sections in this light, it follows that moneys which are owing the debtor, though not yet due, are subject to garnishment, because the term "owing" includes an immature as well as a mature obligation. This is in harmony with what was said in Dunsmoor v. Furstenfeldt, 88 Cal. 522, 529, 26 P. 518, 520 (12 L. R. A. 508, 22 Am. St. Rep. 331), where the Supreme Court say:

"Any kind of obligation of one man to pay money to another is a debt. 'A debt signifies what one owes. There is always some obligation that it shall be paid; but the manner in which * * * it is to be paid, or the means of coercing payment do not enter into the definition.'"

Again in Melvin v. State, 121 Cal. 16, 24, 53 P. 416, 419, the Supreme Court say:

"The term 'debt,' however, has a much broader popular significance than the foregoing technical definition, and includes that which is due from one person to another, whether money, goods or services; that which one person is bound to pay to another, or to perform for his benefit; thing owed; obligation; liability."

In Trow v. Moody, 27 Cal. App. 403, 405, 150 P. 77, 78, in a case involving the interpretation of section 710, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to execution upon moneys due a judgment debtor from a public corporation, the appellate court say:

"The statute permits the filing of such a transcript where 'money is owing to the judgment debtor.' The ordinary rule as applicable to garnishment applies, which is that a garnishment will impound a debt even though the time of payment has not arrived. Drake on Attachment, § 355; Waples on Attachment & Garnishment, p. 264; 2 Shinn on Attachment, § 480."

The respondent contends in support of the judgment that the proceeds of the policy were not subject to garnishment, because at the time of the levy the insured had not filed his proofs of loss. It is true, as stated by the respondent, that the insurance policy specifically provided that no action could be maintained by the insured against the insurer until after proofs of loss had been filed. It is also true that the policy provided that the loss should be payable in 30 days after the amount had been ascertained "either by agreement or by appraisement, but if such ascertainment is not had or made within 60 days after the receipt by the company of the preliminary proof of loss, then the loss shall be payable in 90 days after such receipt." The general rule as to the application of attachment process to moneys so held is found in 12 Ruling Case Law, section 33, page 804, where it is said:

"It may be said to be the general rule that the right which the insured possesses against an insurance company under a policy of insurance on property is subject to garnishment at the suit of creditors of the insured. But it is clear that the creditors of the insured cannot compel payment of the policy by process of garnishment against the insurance company, if the insured himself has forfeited the right to enforce collection by violating conditions contained in the policy. The fact that in order to be entitled to the proceeds of a policy the debtor must perform certain conditions precedent, as furnishing proofs of loss, does not preclude garnishment, but the creditor may make proofs if the insured fails to do so. Nor does the fact that the loss has not been adjusted prevent garnishment."

The reason for the rule is well stated in Girard Fire & Marine Insurance Co. v. Field, Merritt & Co., 45 Pa. 129, 132, et seq., where the court say:

"There is a close affinity between the root and the branches of the remedy by attachment. In the former, as in the latter, unliquidated damages in tort are not within it, nor a claim for damages arising from a mere breach of contract; but I think what was said in Fisher v. Consequa, 2 W. C. C. Rep. 382, in defining the foundation of the process, very well defines also to what it may be applied; that is, to 'a demand arising ex contractu, the amount of which was ascertained, or which was susceptible of ascertainment by some standard referable to the contract itself, sufficiently certain to enable the plaintiff by affidavit to aver, or a jury to find it, might be the foundation of a proceeding by way of foreign attachment, without reference to the form of action, or the technical definition of debt, the expression used in the law.' True, this was said in regard to the nature of the claim on which foreign attachment may issue, and we held the same thing in Carlin v. Bierne et al., 1 Wright, 228, but the process is evidently founded upon, and operates on, what must be regarded as demands, although not technically debts. Where the matter to be levied on is a chose in action, we think no greater certainty is required, or a more definite standard for its ascertainment is necessary, than that upon which it is founded. Applying that test to a claim like the present, the amount due could be averred on oath, if necessary, and on proof of loss, the amount could be ascertained by reference to the policy stipulating for the amount to be paid in the contingency which has happened. It is true, the value of the property may have to be ascertained, but this is not a serious difficulty, for there exists a standard for property in every community, viz., its market value. It is quite as easy to prove what 100 bushels of wheat are worth which have been lost by fire, as what they would have been worth if sold, and the price claimed on a quantum valebant. The value per bushel being proved, the ascertainment of the amount would be easy. It would depend on calculation only. * * * No one would doubt, on the other hand, but that on a valued policy, after a loss, the amount might be attached. The fact of loss would be the only fact to be established. Like a debt payable on demand, there is but one preliminary to be proved if the instrument be admitted, namely, the demand; and in the former, the loss. So where a risk is taken on a house the amount is fixed, the agreement to pay, and the time and manner are also fixed, and the only thing to be proved is the extent of the loss—the value of the property destroyed; for this, as already said, the value of such property in the market, is a standard sufficiently certain to enable a jury to ascertain it. I cannot allow myself to doubt but that insurance money, after a fire, is strictly personal estate, and is certainly within the term 'effects,' and as such the law gives a remedy to the insured to reduce it to possession."

Dec. 239; Chipman v. Carroll, 53 Kan. 163, 35 P. 1109, 25 L. R. A. 305; and Finch v. Great American Ins. Co., 101 Conn. 332, 125 A. 628.

Respondents cite Early v. Redwood City, 57 Cal. 193, Redondo Beach Co. v. Brewer et al., 101 Cal. 322, 35 P. 896, and Hassie v. G. I. W. U. Congregation, 35 Cal. 378, and Aigeltinger Co. v. Healy-Tibbitts Co., 23 Cal. App. 608, 139 P. 436, 438, all to the effect that moneys were not subject to garnishment which were not due at the time of the levy or upon which the judgment debtor could not have sued the garnishee in assumpsit. The first three cases cited do not hold more than that there must be a debt due and owing the judgment debtor at the time of the attachment, a rule which is strictly in accord with the provisions of the Code which we have cited. In the Aigeltinger Case, the Appellate Court went beyond the rule of these cases and added that in addition to a debt being due "the right to sue at the date of attachment is the true test." In denying a petition to transfer this case to the Supreme Court, the latter court based its denial upon the ground that the case, being within the appellate jurisdiction of the former court, the Supreme Court was bound by the facts stated in that opinion. It was then said (by the Supreme Court):

"On those facts, it appears that there was, at the date of the garnishment, no debt, matured or unmatured, due the plaintiff. This being so, there was clearly nothing subject to attachment. We do not express any opinion on the correctness of the broader declaration of the District Court of Appeal that there must be, at the date of the garnishment, a present right of action; in other words, that a debt which is due, but not yet payable, may not be attached."

The respondent has not directed our attention to any authority in this state, other than the Appellate Court decision in the Aigeltinger Case, which holds that the right to sue at the date of the attachment is the true test, and our own search of the authorities satisfies us that the general rule is that the term "debts," as used in attachment statutes, applies to either a matured or unmatured debt and that the present right to sue is not essential. In this connection we quote from 28 Corpus Juris, page 129, section 171:

"But generally debts contracted, although not presently payable or matured, but which will certainly become payable in the future, may be reached. And this, although the terminology of the statute is that claims or debts 'due' may be garnished, the term 'due' being taken in its larger sense as importing merely an existing obligation, without reference to the time of payment."

Neblett v. Barron (Tex. Civ. App.) 160 S. W. 1167, 1170, states the general rule as follows:

"The term 'due' does not necessarily mean that the debt is immediately payable. In commercial law it is often used as synonymous with

'owing,' and includes all debts, whether payable in praesenti or in futuro, and it is in this latter sense, we think, it is used in the statute under consideration. In other words, in such cases the wages not only 'accrue,' within the meaning of the statute—for the purpose of securing the lien—at the end of the week, but are also then due and payable, regardless of an agreement to the contrary."

Upon the specific question of the application of the attachment statutes to insurance moneys after a loss and before adjustment, we refer to Drake on Attachment (7th Ed.), p. 493, § 549, from which we quote:

"But where under a contract of indemnity a loss has occurred, and the party indemnified has a claim for such loss against him who engaged to indemnify him, the latter may be charged as his garnishee in respect of such loss, if the contract furnish a standard by which the amount of the liability may be ascertained and fixed. Thus, an insurance company may be so charged on account of a loss accruing under a policy of insurance issued by it; for the liability to the insured clearly exists, and the policy furnishes the required standard. This has been held, not only as to adjusted claims for loss, but also as to such claims unadjusted."

The portion of the judgment appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by F. B. Steen, doing business under the firm name and style of the Blue Seal Syrup Company, against the Southern California Supply Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Butler, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

McGee & Sumner, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages alleged to have been caused by reason of the sale and delivery by the defendant to the plaintiff of a quantity of caramel coloring matter. The defendant answered, and a trial was had before the trial court sitting with a jury. The jury brought in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff on which judgment was entered, and from that judgment the defendant has appealed. The appellant makes one point, and that is that plaintiff's recovery may be justified only by reason of an implied or expressed warranty of the caramel color.

[1] Mr. Steen personally made the purchase. He testified that in April or May, 1922, one of the solicitors of the defendant called on him a number of times. He did not remember the name of the solicitor. He stated that Mr. Fish, who was also a solicitor of the defendant, called on him once. Mr. Steen, referring to the solicitor first mentioned, testified that—

"He spoke about sugar coloring being just as good or perhaps better than any, and could furnish it for less money than we were paying, and said, 'Why not patronize home industry?' * * * The salesman said that the coloring matter was all right, that it would stand up with any coloring matter as far as quality was concerned, and was as good as anything we had used. * * *"

Some days later, Mr. Steen went to the store of the defendant and made a purchase of some caramel coloring. At the time the purchase was actually made, it is not claimed that any words were said which constituted a warranty. If an express warranty was made, it must be found in the language quoted above.

In 1 Williston on Sales, § 202, it is said:

"It is not easy to draw the line accurately between affirmation of fact on the one hand and statements of opinion on the other. Several distinctions may be noticed. In the first place, it seems obvious that any statement may be put in the form of a statement of opinion. If the seller says a horse is sound, he affirms a fact; but when he states that he believes him to be sound, the only fact which he asserts is his belief, and if he does in fact believe the horse to be sound, he could not be held liable if the horse were not sound. Again there are some matters which, even though asserted positively, are in their nature so dependent on individual opinion that no matter how positive the seller's assertion, it is not held to create a warranty. Such assertions as that things are fine or valuable, or better than productions of rival makers, are of this sort."

In Maggioros v. Edson Bros. (Sup.) 164 N. Y. S. 377, the court said:

"The letter in which the word 'excellent' is used shows that the defendants were not making any promise or affirmation of fact with reference to the cheese; for, while they said that the cheese that they had on hand was of excellent quality, they proposed to forward a case for the approval of the plaintiffs, and this was done. The following expressions have been held not to constitute an express warranty: 'XX pipe iron' (Dounce v. Dow, 64 N. Y. 411); 'extra fine' peas (Waeber v. Talbot, 43 App. Div. 180, 59 N. Y. S. 396); 'best piece of cloth in the market' (Strauss v. Salzer, 58 Misc. Rep. 573, 109 N. Y. S. 734); 'unsurpassed and unsurpassable' (League Cycle Co. v. Abrahams, 27 Misc. Rep. 548, 58 N. Y. S. 306); 'very fine stock' (Stumpp v. Walker Co. [Stumpp & Walker Co. v. Lynber (Sup.)] 84 N. Y. S. 912); 'suitable and proper for New York City market' (Bartlett v. Hoppock, 34 N. Y. 118, 88 Am. Dec. 428); 'very good condition' (Ginsberg v. Lawrence, [Sup.] 121 N. Y. S. 337); 'very fine reading-matter, fit for anybody to read' (St. Hubert Guild v. Quinn, 64 Misc. Rep. 336, 118 N. Y. S. 582); 'sound corn' (Lawton v. Keil, 61 Barb. [N. Y.] 558); and 'good excellent butter' (Greenthal v. Schneider, 52 How. Prac. [N. Y.] 153 [133]). No particular phraseology is necessary (Oneida Mfg. Co. v. Lawrence, 4 Cow. [N. Y.] 440); but there must be an express and direct affirmation of the kind, character, or description of the goods (Chapman v. Murch, 19 Johns. [N. Y.] 290, 10 Am. Dec. 227), upon which the purchaser relies (Crocker-Wheeler El. Co. v. Johns-Pratt Co., 29 App. Div. 300, 51 N. Y. S. 793)."

In Washburn-Crosby Co. v. Kindervatter, 147 App. Div. 114, 131 N. Y. S. 871, it was held that representations that the flour "would be as good as any made" and that the flour which the buyer had been using would not "be in it," did not constitute express warranties. The language used by the defendant's solicitors did not, therefore, amount to anything more than "puffing talk."

[2] There was no implied warranty under section 1767 of the Civil Code because there was no evidence that the seller knew "that the buyer relies upon his advice or judgment; * * *" and there was no evidence that the seller knew "the existence of any fact concerning the thing sold which would, to his knowledge, destroy the buyer's inducement to buy."

[3] There was no implied warranty under section 1769 of the Civil Code for two reasons. The proof did not show that the defendant manufactured the caramel coloring; and, second, there was no evidence that there was any "latent defect, not disclosed to the buyer, arising from the process of manufacture, * * *" and there was no evidence that any improper materials were used in the manufacture thereof.

[4] There was no implied warranty under section 1771 of the Civil Code because the merchandise was not "inaccessible to the examination of the buyer," and there was no evidence that it was not sound and merchantable.

[5] There was no implied warranty under section 1773 of the Civil Code, because the marking on the can did not purport to express the quantity or quality thereof, or the place where it was in whole or in part produced, manufactured, or prepared. The marking was as follows: "Invincible S. C. S. C. Brand—The Southern California Supply Company, Incorporated, 812-14-16 East Third Street, Los Angeles, California." That marking merely indicated the brand and the place where the article was on sale. There was no evidence of any breach as to either of those matters.

[6] There was no implied warranty under section 1775 of the Civil Code, because there was no evidence that the defendant "makes a business of selling provisions for domestic use," nor that the plaintiff bought for actual consumption, nor is there any evidence that the caramel color was not sound and wholesome.

Of course, there is evidence in the record to the effect that the particular caramel color was not satisfactory for making ginger ale which was to be held in bottles for two weeks or longer. But there is no evidence in the record that the defendant knew that the purchaser was expecting to use the caramel color in the manufacture of ginger ale or that the ginger ale was to be kept two weeks or longer, or that the defendant made any statement to the effect that the caramel color was fit or proper to use in the manufacture of ginger ale.

We think that the appellant is clearly correct in his contention that the evidence does not sustain the judgment.

Ex parte FISHER. (Cr. 1294.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 26, 1925.)

Health ⟸24—City and county health officer may isolate one afflicted with infectious disease.

While Pol. Code, § 2979a, does not expressly confer on city and county health officer right to take possession or control of body of one afflicted with infectious disease, as it does on state board of health, isolation of one so afflicted is reasonable and proper measure to prevent increase and spread of such disease within powers conferred on such officer by such act, and one so isolated cannot secure release from quarantine under writ of habeas corpus.

Application by Mabel Fisher for writ of habeas corpus to William C. Hassler, as Health Officer of the City and County of San Francisco, to secure release from quarantine. Writ denied.

Ernest B. D. Spagnoli and Walter F. Lynch, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

TYLER, P. J. Application for writ of habeas corpus. It appears from the petition that on or about August 14, 1925, Dr. Wm. C. Hassler, health officer of the city and county of San Francisco, after an examination, ordered petitioner quarantined at the County Hospital, he having found her to be suffering with a gonococcus affliction.

It is claimed that such detention is unlawful, for the reason that such officer is without authority to control the body of petitioner, such power residing alone in the state board of health.

Section 2979a of the Political Code confers upon health officers of every county or city and county the right to take such measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of diseases of the character of which the applicant is suffering.

While the section does not in express terms confer upon the officer in question the right to take possession or control of the body of one so afflicted as it does in the case of state board of health, the isolation of one afflicted with an infectious disease is a reasonable and proper measure to prevent the increase and spread thereof. In re Johnson, 40 Cal. App. 242, 180 P. 644.

The petition showing on its face a legal cause of detention, the application is denied.

LEVY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 5341.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Aug. 24, 1925.)

1. Insurance ⟸514—No action maintainable on policy indemnifying hospital before final judgment against hospital as provided by policy.

No action can be maintained against an insurance company on a policy insuring a hospital from liability for damages until final judgment is recovered against assured, where policy so provides, in view of Civ. Code, § 2778, subd. 2.

2. Charities ⟸45(2)—Charitable institution exempt from liability cannot become liable by procurement of indemnity insurance.

A charitable institution, not subject to liability for damages by reason of property of charities being held as trust funds, which cannot be depleted by acts of trustee, cannot become liable by procurement of indemnity insurance.

3. Charities ⟸45(2)—Character of hospital as a charity may be shown by methods of transacting its business.

In action for damages against hospital, claimed to be exempt from liability as a charity, such character may be shown, not only by articles of incorporation, but by method of transacting business of hospital.

4. Charities ⟸45(2)—Indemnity insurance not relevant evidence to show character of hospital as noncharitable institution.

In action for damages against hospital, claimed to be exempt from liability as a charity, a policy insuring hospital against liability is not relevant evidence, as basis for inference that officers in procuring insurance were conscious of institution not being a charity, and thereby to prove noncharitable nature of hospital, since such is not the most plain and probable inference from proposed evidence.

5. Witnesses ⟸21—Refusal to produce incompetent evidence or answer irrelevant questions does not constitute contempt and order of contempt reviewable on certiorari.

Refusal by witness to produce writing not competent as evidence, or to answer questions not pertinent to issues, does not constitute contempt of court, and an order adjudging witness in contempt for such refusal is invalid and may be reviewed on certiorari.

Application by Meyer Levy for certiorari to review a judgment of Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. Judgment annulled.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, and Charles R. Wayland, of Palo Alto, for petitioner.

Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. A proceeding to review a judgment of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, adjudging petitioner, Meyer Levy, guilty of contempt of court, the facts as shown by the petition being as follows:

An action was commenced by Mae Kilroy Kane against Mount Zion Hospital, a corporation, and others to recover damages for bodily injuries suffered by plaintiff on June 22, 1923, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the corporation and its servants in the care and treatment of plaintiff while a patient in the hospital conducted by the corporation. The corporation answered the complaint, denying negligence, and, as a further defense, alleged that at all the times mentioned in the complaint it was organized and existed solely for charitable and nonprofit purposes; that the hospital referred to in the complaint was at all the times mentioned therein operated solely for such purposes; that the facts alleged were known to plaintiff and her husband, who was joined as a party plaintiff in the action, at the time plaintiff entered the hospital; that all the servants of defendant therein were selected with due care, and that at no time did defendant have reason to believe that its servants were otherwise than careful and competent. Whether the services rendered or to be rendered to plaintiff were or were not gratuitous does not appear from the pleadings.

Thereafter plaintiff gave notice to defendants of her intention to take the deposition of petitioner, who was then the secretary of the corporation defendant, before respondent, superior court, the notice being accompanied by an affidavit showing that the proceeding was one within the provisions of section 2021 of the Code of Civil Procedure. A subpœna was issued and served upon petitioner, requiring his appearance before the court at a time fixed, and further requiring him to bring into court a certain policy of indemnity insurance, together with all certificates and indorsements attached thereto, said policy being numbered 1466440, dated March 4, 1920, and issued by the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York to defendant corporation. Petitioner appeared as required by the subpœna, but, on the advice of counsel representing the corporation defendant, refused to answer questions asked by counsel for plaintiff, though directed so to do by the court, as to whether the witness had brought with him the policy described in the subpœna, whether the corporation carried a policy of indemnity insurance which insured it against the consequences of the negligent acts of its employees, and as to whether the corporation carried a policy in the company above named, a purported copy of which was shown to the witness, and which copy is set forth in the order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt of court; and refused, in response to the demand of counsel and the order of the court, to produce the original of the purported copy of the policy mentioned above. To the questions asked and the demands for the production of the policy, counsel for defendant corporation interposed the objections that the questions were, and the evidence sought to be elicited would be, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; and it is contended by counsel for petitioner in this proceeding that petitioner could not be adjudged guilty of contempt of court for his failure to answer questions subject to such an objection, or for his failure to produce papers or documents not pertinent to the issues in the case, and that the court acted without jurisdiction in making such order.

As stated by counsel for plaintiff at the time, the purpose of the inquiry was to show that the original of the purported copy made a part of the record herein existed, that it insured defendant against the consequences of the negligent acts of its employees, and that the purported copy was a true copy thereof. The copy mentioned was, in form, a policy of indemnity insurance, issued by the company above named, dated March 4, 1920, and which, in consideration of the maximum premium therein mentioned, by its terms indemnified Mount Zion Hospital, a corporation, against loss from liability imposed by law for damages on account of bodily injuries or death suffered by any patient or patients at the hospital of the assured in consequence of any malpractice, error, or mistake made within the hospital in the giving of medical, surgical, or hospital treatment by any person employed by the assured in the giving of such treatment, and further provided as follows:

"The company shall not be liable to pay any loss nor shall any action be brought against the company to recover under this policy until a final judgment shall have been recovered against the assured in a suit covered thereby," and that "the insolvency or bankruptcy of the assured shall not release the company from any payment for which it would otherwise be liable under this policy, and if such insolvency or bankruptcy shall occur and an execution on a judgment recovered in a suit against the assured covered by this policy is returned unsatisfied, the judgment creditor shall have a right of action to recover the amount of such judgment against the company to the same extent that the assured would have to recover against the company had the assured paid said judgment, but in no event shall the company's liability exceed the limits expressed in this policy."

Attached to the copy above mentioned was a purported indorsement by the insurer continuing the policy in force from March 4, 1923, to March 4, 1924.

[1] Under a policy containing the above provisions no liability would accrue as an enforceable claim against the insurer until the recovery of a final judgment against the insured; and no action by plaintiff thereon could be maintained. Civ. Code, § 2778, subd. 2; Treloar v. Keil et al., 36 Cal. App. 159, 171 P. 823; Terry v. Southwestern Building Co., 43 Cal. App. 372, 185 P. 212; Fernandez v. Tormey, 121 Cal. 518, 519, 53 P. 1119.

It is urged by counsel for respondent that, assuming the allegations as to the character and purposes of defendant corporation to be true, the rule of exemption from liability for the negligent acts of the employees of a charity has not been adopted as the rule in California, citing Stewart v. Cal. Medical, etc., Ass'n, 178 Cal. 418, 423, 176 P. 46. With this question, however, we are not here concerned, as the facts sought to be proved by plaintiff would be relevant and material only on the assumption that the character and purposes of defendant corporation are material elements in the case. If the latter be immaterial, then the fact of the existence of the policy in question is also immaterial; the only purpose, if any, for which the policy would be competent and relevant being as evidence tending to prove that the character and purposes of the corporation were other than those alleged or as a fact rendering any rule of nonliability otherwise available as a defense inapplicable, it not being contended that the policy would be competent as evidence that the corporation or its servants were guilty of the negligence alleged in the complaint.

[2] It is further contended that, assuming the corporation to be a charity as alleged, the policy in question protects the trust fund against depletion, and that therefore the reason for the rule, if any, exempting the corporation from liability, and based upon the fact of the trust fund, fails.

In jurisdictions where the rule exempting charities from liability has been adopted, and the reason for the rule based upon the trust fund theory, it is held that the charity, whether incorporated or not, is a trustee, and is bound to apply the funds or property in furtherance of the charity and not otherwise, and that the law will not permit the trustee to deplete the fund set aside for charity by using it in paying damages caused by the acts of those engaged in administering the trust. Adams v. University Hospital, 122 Mo. App. 675, 99 S. W. 453; Gable v. Sisters of St. Francis, 227 Pa. 254, 75 A. 1087, 136 Am. St. Rep. 879; Roosen v. Peter Bent Brigham Hospital, 235 Mass. 66, 126 N. E. 392, 14 A. L. R. 563.

If a liability may be created or an exemption waived by the acts of the trustee of a charity in procuring and accepting the promise of a third person to make good the losses following such liability or waiver, and the trustee thus allowed to accomplish indirectly that which is not permitted to be done directly, the protection afforded by the rule created would be destroyed. No authorities holding in accordance with the argumen of counsel in this behalf have been called to our attention; and it is our opinion that the theory that a charity, not otherwise subject to liability, may become liable by reason of the procurement by those administering it of indemnity insurance cannot be supported in principle. It is further contended that the policy would be admissible as evidence tending to show the character of the corporation and the manner of conducting the hospital.

[3, 4] The character of the defendant is to be determined not alone by the powers and purposes defined in its articles of incorporation but also by the method of transacting the business of the hospital. Stewart v. Cal. Med., etc., Ass'n, supra. As a general rule, any facts having rational probative value would be admissible for that purpose; and it is urged that the policy would be relevant as the basis for certain inferences, in that the act of the officers of the corporation in procuring the insurance policy would be evidence of their consciousness that defendant is not a charity as alleged, and that the hospital was not being conducted for such purposes, but for purposes making necessary or proper the procurement of insurance protecting the corporation from the possible legal consequences of its conduct, and that from such consciousness might be inferred the ultimate fact sought to be shown.

As stated in Wigmore on Evidence, § 267 et seq., there is a large class of cases where consciousness is of service evidentially as forming a second step of inference to some other fact which forms the ultimate object of proof. Conduct is competent and relevant as evidence of consciousness of guilt in criminal proceedings; and the principle has been applied in cases where questions of ownership or employment were in issue, and wherein the fact of the procurement of indemnity insurance was admitted as evidence relevant to such issues. Perkins v. Rice, 187 Mass. 28, 72 N. E. 323; Davis v. North Carolina Shipbuilding Co., 180 N. C. 74, 104 S. E. 82.

In the numerous cases where, from the act of improving the condition of places and objects after the occurrence of an injury alleged to have been caused by such condition, an inference of negligence has been sought to be drawn on the assumption that such act would indicate a consciousness or belief that the injury was caused by the negligence of the owner, such evidence has been generally rejected, the rule of exclusion being applied on the ground that the supposed inference from the act was not the plain and most probable one; and that while on the theory of relevancy the inference sought to be drawn from such fact was fairly possible, and the fact would thus be brought within the general rule as to admissibility, by a rule of policy based upon the possibility that greater weight might be given thereto than could be reasonably justified, or that the fact might be considered as supporting issues to which it would not be relevant, the evidence should be excluded.

A similar situation is presented in the instant case, in that while the evidence offered has indirectly a degree of probative value on the issue as to the character and purposes of defendant corporation, the ultimate conclusion sought to be drawn therefrom is not the plain or most probable one, and the weight which might fairly be given thereto would not overcome the well-settled reasons of policy for the exclusion of evidence of this character; and when the uncertainty as to the rule to be applied to facts such as are alleged in the pleading mentioned, as indicated by the language of the court in Stewart v. Cal. Med., etc., Ass'n, supra, is considered, it appears to us that the act of the corporation in procuring a policy of the character hereinbefore assumed could be the basis for no reasonable inference other that as a prudent trustee, in view of such uncertainty, it deemed such protection necessary and proper, pending action by the Legislature or a final determination of the question by the courts.

[5] The refusal of a witness to produce writings which would not be competent as evidence, or to answer questions not pertinent to the issues of the case, does not constitute contempt; and before a witness can be held to be in contempt it must appear that the evidence sought to be adduced would be competent, relevant, and material under such issues; and an order adjudging a witness guilty of contempt for his failure to produce such writings or to answer such questions is invalid, and such an order may be reviewed on certiorari. Ex parte Zeehandelaar, 71 Cal. 238, 12 P. 259; Hupp v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 162, 133 P. 987; Kimball v. Superior Court, 38 Cal. App. 761, 177 P. 488; Commercial Bank, etc., v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 395, 220 P. 422.

In the instant case it does not appear from the order that the court considered the policy to be admissible for any purposes other than those urged by counsel for respondent as hereinbefore stated; and it is our conclusion that, as evidence for such purposes, or for any purpose under the issues presented by the pleadings, it would not be admissible; that respondent was therefore without jurisdiction to adjudge petitioner guilty of contempt of court; that the judgment should be annulled; and it is so ordered.
